

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

WHEN the late Lord William Bentinck, Governor-General of British India, had his celebrated interview with the late Maharaja Runjeet Singh, at Roopur, he was accompanied by Henry Thoby Prinsep, Esq., then Secretary of the Indian Government (since one of the Members of Council), who, in 1834, published, at Calcutta, a volume containing a History of the Political Life of Runjeet Singh, and an account of the origin of the Sikh Power in the Punjab. The circumstances under which this work was prepared were stated by Mr. Prinsep in his Preface as follows:—

“ The British Government, has, since 1808, been the protector of the Sikh territory lying between the Sutluj and Jumna: its officers have been appealed to for the adjustment of all disputes between the chiefs and their neighbours or dependants, and the references to the Supreme Council of Government at the Presidency are frequent, and involve questions of great intricacy, making the management of our relations in that quarter by no means the least troublesome part of the business submitted to its decision. Lord William Bentinck was led by the perception of this circumstance to seek from the officers employed in the management of Sikh affairs some general information as to the history and condition of the chiefs, and the habits and customs of the sect. Accordingly, when preparing for his journey to Hindustan, in 1830, he called upon Captain William Murray, the Political Agent at Umbala, who had for more than fifteen years been employed in conducting our relations with the Sikh chiefs on the British side of the Sutluj, for a Report upon the subject. Captain Wade, the Assistant at Lodiana, who had latterly been intrusted with the subordinate charge, under the Resident at Delhi, of the correspondence with Runjeet Singh, was similarly called upon, and both officers submitted voluminous Reports, containing valuable information on all the points required. That of Captain Murray was the result of much reading and research, and was prepared from materials collected during the whole period of his residence amongst the Sikhs. He had evidently consulted with care all the Persian and other books that afford any insight into the history of the Sikhs, or of the Mogul and Afghan officers who came into contact or collision with them; while his account of the rise and fortunes of Runjeet Singh was compiled from the reports and verbal information of intelligent persons, who had served under him, corrected and tested by a laborious examination of the Akhbars, or native newspapers, files of which were recorded in his office: a valuable Appendix was added, containing the result of his personal observations and inquiries into the habits, customs, rules, and observances of the Sikhs. Unfortunately, this highly-esteemed and distinguished officer died very soon after the Governor-General visited those parts, when it was his lordship's intention to have requested him to prepare, from his Report, a volume calculated to diffuse the information he had collected, and to give public and general utility to the result of his labours.

“ There is no doubt that, if this officer had lived, the work would have been executed in a manner worthy of his abilities. His sudden death has rendered it necessary that what he left incomplete, and had put together in haste, without due order or arrangement, should be completed and revised by another hand. The whole of the historical part of his Report has been re-written, the arrangement has been partially altered, and the narrative has been cast into chapters, in the form it now assumes; besides which, there is new matter added from Captain Wade’s Report, and from other sources. It has hence been impossible to place Captain Murray’s name on the title-page as the author, so as to make him responsible, before the public, for what he never saw or approved. It will, however, be understood that, except in the tenth and eleventh Chapters of Continuation (the sixteenth and seventeenth of this work), the task of the compiler of the following pages has been merely that of rédacteur, and that the merit of having collected the information, which gives to the work any interest or value it may possess, belongs almost entirely to Captain Murray. Indeed, next to the desire to rescue from the oblivion of a record-office information calculated to be so extensively useful, and to give to the public access to what had been collected with so much labour and research, the motive that has principally influenced the Compiler to undertake the preparation of this volume for the press, has been the wish to do honour to this distinguished and lamented officer, and to lay before his friends and the world a lasting testimony of his worth and talents.

“It may be proper to add, that while the first part of this work was already in the printer’s hands, a Persian account of the affairs of the Sikhs in the Punjab was obligingly communicated to the compiler by Sir Charles Metcalfe. The manuscript had been delivered to Sir Charles by its author, Khooshwuqt Raee, who was for many years the agent and intelligencer of the British Government at Amritsur. The narrative comes down to 1812 only, but is very full in respect to the early history of the Sikh sirdars, and contains much information and useful matter, not to be found elsewhere. The opportunity which was thus presented of comparing an original work of this kind with the Memoir of Captain Murray has not been lost. The result has afforded a satisfactory corroboration of the accuracy of this officer; indeed, the correspondence of date and circumstance, in many important particulars, leads almost to the conclusion, that Khooshwuqt Raee's narrative must have been amongst the materials from which the Memoir was prepared. Some occasional discrepancies, and additional facts or illustrations, have been noted separately at the close of the volume. The Compiler's grateful acknowledgments are particularly due to Sir Charles Metcalfe, for the liberal frankness with which so valuable a material has been made available to improve and correct this publication."

The recent events in the Punjab have attracted the attention of Europe to that portion of India, and a deep interest has been excited in England respecting the scene of some of the most splendid achievements of our army in a country now united by intimate relations with Great Britain. It is much to be regretted that the present engagements of Mr. Prinsep do not allow him sufficient leisure to meet the public demand for information upon this subject by expanding his work (which has been long out of print) into a history of the Punjab, which his large stores of geographical, classical, and oriental knowledge, added to his official experience and information, would have rendered most valuable.

With the sanction of Mr. Prinsep for the use made of his volume, the office has been undertaken by the present Editor, who has supplied the first five and the last nine chapters of the work now before the reader.

HISTORY OF THE PUNJAB,

HYDROGRAPHY OF THE PUNJAB.

THE region of North - Western India, known in modern times under the name of the Punjab, is remarkably well defined by geographical limits. On the north it has the Pir-Panjal range of the vast Himalaya mountains; on the west, the Khybur and Soliman ranges, and the great river Indus, which runs almost due south to the Indian Ocean, being the western boundary of Hindustan; whilst on the south and east, the river Sutluj separates it from the territories of what is now British India. The country is of an ovoidal form, lying between the parallels of 29° and 34° north, and the meridians of 71° and 76° east, and its area is estimated at 85,000 square miles. Five large streams, the arteries of the Indus, traverse this region, and divide it into four doabs,* as the tracts inclosed betwixt the forks of two rivers are termed in the country, and give to it the name of Punjab, or 'Country of the Five Rivers.'† The modern names of these rivers, in their succession eastward from the Indus, are the Jelum, the Chenab, the Ravi, the Beas, and the Sutluj. A geographical description of the country will most properly commence with a delineation of the courses and characters of these great streams, which are not only its

* Do-ab, 'two rivers,' i. e. the tract which intervenes betwixt two rivers; corresponding to the Greek Mesopotamia.

† Punj-ab, 'Five Rivers.' The five streams are considered to include the Indus and exclude the Beas, on account of its short course. Strabo places the rivers, after the Indus, in the following order: "Postea Hydaspes (Jelum), postea Acesines (Chenab), postea Hyarotes (Ravi), postremo Hypanis." Unless by the last name (which other ancient geographers appropriate to the Sutluj) he means the Hyphasis, the Beas is omitted.

distinguishing physical features, enabling us to verify the earliest authentic accounts of this portion of India, recorded by the historians of Alexander the Great, who marched across the entire country of the Punjab; but which possess much importance in respect to the political, military, commercial, and agricultural relations of the country.

The Indus, or Sindh, as it has been called from time immemorial to the present day, by the natives,* is now known to have its remote and primitive source in the Kailasa range of the Himalayas, the Olympus of the Hindus, and the seat of their holiest myths (the highest elevation being estimated at 30,000 feet), in 31° 20' N. lat., and 81° 15' E. long., at a place called Kanre, Kangri, or Kantisi, a short distance to the south-east of Ghertope, where the great eastern branch of the Indus is called Sinh-ka-bab, or 'Lion's Mouth,' in reference to a Tibetan fable, which makes the rivers of India issue from the mouths of different animals.* After traversing the country of Chan-than, from the south-east to the north-west, it enters Ladakh, on its eastern frontier, about thirty miles east of Leh, its capital; bends more to the north, then inclines to the west, and having been joined by several large streams and mountain torrents, turns to the south, towards the plains, constituting the great receptacle of the masses of melted snow, which are periodically brought from the lofty ridges of Tibet, to fertilize the alluvial tracts of Western India. From the sudden melting of these vast accumulations of ice, and from temporary obstacles, occasioned by glaciers and avalanches in its upper course, this river is subject to irregularities, and especially to debacles, or cataclysms, one of which, attributed to a land-slip, in 1841, produced terrific devastation along its course, down even to Attock.†

At the confluence of the Sinh-ka-bab with the Shayuk, the principal river which joins it on the north from the Karakorum mountains, the river takes the name of Aba Sindh, 'Father Sindh,' or Indus proper, and flowing then between lofty rocks, which confine its furious waters, receiving the tribute of various streams, and at Acho expanding into a broader surface, it reaches Derbend, the north-western angle of the Punjab, where (about 650 miles from its source) it is 100 yards wide in August, its fullest season. From Derbend it traverses a plain, in a broad channel of no great depth, to Attock, in $33^{\circ} 54'$ N. lat., $72^{\circ} 18'$ E. long., having, about 200 yards above this place, received the river of Cabul,* almost equal in breadth and volume, and attains a width of 858 feet, with a rapid boiling current, running at the rate (in August) of six miles an hour. Various accounts, however, are given of the breadth of the Indus at Attock, which depends not only upon the season but the state of the river upwards. The breadth was found by Mr. Elphinstone, in June, to be 260 yards; by Mr. Trebeck, in November, about 100 yards; by Sir A. Burnes, in March, 120 yards. But Lieutenant Barr* found the river at Attock, in March, swollen with rain, had split into various branches, and bounded with resistless speed, dashing its waters into foam against the rocks. Its violence had swept away the bridge of boats.

This is the limit of the upward navigation of the Indus. From Attock (where the river takes this name†), the course of the Indus to the sea, 940 miles, is south and south-west, sometimes along a rocky channel, between high perpendicular cliffs, or forcing its way, tumbling and roaring, amidst huge boulders, the immense body of water being pent up within a narrow channel, causing occasional whirlpools, dangerous to navigation, to Kalabagh, in 32° 57' N. lat., 71° 36' E. long., situated in a gorge of the great Salt Range, through which the river rushes forth into the plain.* In this part of its course it has acquired the name of Nil-ab, or 'Blue Water,' from the colour imparted to it by the blue limestone hills through which it flows. There are some remains of a town on the bank of the river, named Nilab (where Timur crossed the Indus), supposed to be the Naulibus or Naulibe of Ptolemy.† From the middle of May to September, the upward navigation from Kalabagh to Attock is impracticable; the downward voyage may be performed at all seasons. The villages in this section of the river are perched on the verge of its banks, standing on the bare rock, without a blade of vegetation near them.‡

At Kalabagh, the Indus enters a level country, having, for a short time, the Khusooree hills, which rise abruptly, on the right. It now becomes muddy, and as far as Mittunkote, about 350 miles, the banks being low, the river, when it rises, inundates

the country sometimes as far as the eye can reach. Hence the channels are continually changing, and the soil of the country being soft,—a “mud basin,” as Lieutenant Wood terms it,—the banks and bed of the river are undergoing constant alterations. These variations, added to the shoals, and the terrific blasts occasionally encountered in this part of the river, are great impediments to navigation. The population on its banks are almost amphibious; they launch upon its surface, sustained by inflated skins (musuks), dried gourds, and empty jars used for catching the celebrated pulla fish.*

At Mittunkote, the Indus is often 2,000 yards broad, and near this place, in 28° 55' N. lat., 70° 28' E. long., it is joined, without violence, by the Punjnud,† a large navigable stream, the collected waters of the Sutluj, Beas, Ravi, Chenab, and Jelum. Its true channel, then a mile and a quarter wide, flows thence through Sindé, sometimes severed into distinct streams, and discharges its different branches by various mouths into the Indian Ocean, after a course of 1,650 miles.

The Indus, when joined by the Punjnud, never shallows, in the dry season, to less than fifteen feet, and seldom preserves so great a breadth as half a mile. Keeled boats are not suited to its navigation, as they are liable to be upset. The zohruks, or native boats, are flat-bottomed. Gold is found in some parts of the sands of the Indus.

The Jelum,* which is identified with the "fabulosus Hydaspes" of the ancients, the next of the Punjab rivers to the east, rises in the valley of Cashmere, and draining its waters, flows westerly, making its exit at the Pass of Baramula, and joins the Kishengunga, or Hasora river (little inferior in size to the Jelum here), near Mazufferabad, 150 miles from its source, and only sixty miles apart from the Indus ; it then pursues a southerly course, and enters the plains of the Punjab, as a large stream. Its current is impetuous along the channel that winds round the base of the Cashmere mountains. At the town of Jelum, its breadth is greater than that of the Indus before it joins the Cabul river above Attock, being above 450 feet. It is navigable from Bhalani, a village about 110 miles above that town, flowing then at the rate of a mile an hour. Below Jelum its course deflects to the westward, and more so at Jelalpore (where there is a ghat or ferry); at Sahiwal it resumes a southern direction through a flat country, and joins the Chenab in $31^{\circ} 11' 30''$ N. lat., $72^{\circ} 9'$ E. long., after a course of 450 miles, the united streams forming a noble river, a mile broad. Alligators are more numerous in the Jelum than in the other Punjab rivers.

* Its Sanscrit name is Vitastha; Vayat and Behut in the dialects; the Betusta of the Ayees Akberi. The latter, which is still its local name near Jelalpore (the supposed site of the battle between Alexander and Porus), is the probable origin of the Hydaspes of Arrian, and the Bidaspis of Ptolemy. It is called both Dendan and Jamad by Sherif-eddin.

The Chenab,* the Acesines of the Greeks, is the largest of the five great feeders of the Indus. Its source, which has never been reached by Europeans, is placed in the high land of Tibet, about $32^{\circ} 50'$ N. lat., $77^{\circ} 40'$ E. long. After its junction with the Suryabhaga ('Sun-garden'), at Tandi, in $32^{\circ} 30'$ N. lat., $76^{\circ} 55'$ E. long., it first receives the name of Chandrabhaga, from its supposed source in a lake of that name. It is here 200 feet broad, flowing north-west to Kishtewar, in the Himalayas, 130 miles, where it is crossed by a timber bridge, thrown across the rocky chasm, sixty feet deep, worn by the river between two perpendicular walls of gneiss; the centre of the bridge is supported by two huge timbers, the ends of which rest upon fourteen levers projecting on each side, and retained in their places by immense masses of broken rock.* It flows thence south-west, by a tortuous course, through a rugged country, past Doda, to Rihursi, ninety miles, where it leaves the mountains on the north-west, and after flowing to the south, along the edge of the plain, it inclines to the south-west, running through jungle to the open plains of the Punjab, and at Aknur, fifty miles further, it becomes navigable. At Kishtewar it has the name of Chin-ao, and in the plains, Chin-ab, both indicating its connection with Chin, or China, whence Mr. Moorcroft conjectures,* that the Greek name, Ace-Sines, might have a similar origin. It continues to flow south-westerly and westerly to Vazeerabad, the neatest-looking city in the Punjab, where Mr. Elphinstone's mission, in July, 1809, found it to be a mile, three furlongs, and thirty perches, from bank to bank.† Later travellers have diminished its breadth here; Baron Hügel‡ to half a mile, and Mr. Vigne§ to between 200 and 300 yards, "with flat banks and a muddy stream."

From Vazeerabad, it holds a south-westerly course for thirty miles to Ramnuggur, where, in the low season, it is 900 feet wide, with a maximum depth of nine feet, and a current of a mile and a half an hour. After a south-westerly course of 540 miles, it joins the Jelum, about the parallel of $31^{\circ} 10'$, and the combined streams, flowing fifty miles further south-west, unite with the Ravi, below Fazilpore, $30^{\circ} 33'$ N. lat., $71^{\circ} 46'$ E. long., where the Chenab (the name retained by the joint stream) is, at the full season, three-quarters of a mile wide, and twelve feet deep. From thence it continues its course, still south-westerly, for 110 miles, to its confluence with the Ghara, or mingled streams of the Sutluj and Beas, in lat. $29^{\circ} 21'$, long. $71^{\circ} 6'$, where, after a course of 700 miles, it is lost in the Punjnud.

The Jelum and Chenab have been forded  in the cold season, but, when joined, have never been passed but by boats. Timur threw a bridge across the conflux at Trimo ferry, and Runjeet Singh swam the Jelum at Sahiwal, with a large body of horse. The merchants from Persia to India cross at Trimo for Toolumba on the Ravi.

of the ancient geographers, the least of the Punjab rivers, has its source in the country of Burmawur, in Tartary, about $32^{\circ} 30'$ N. lat., $76^{\circ} 25'$ E. long. Its principal source is said to be a little lake, named Muni-mys. It passes the city of Chamba, in the Punjabi Himalayas, first visited by Mr. Vigne,* where it is called Raiva, and, on debouching from the mountains at Bisuli, takes and preserves a south-west course, though a very tortuous one, receiving various tributary streams, and acquires the name of Ravi. Near Lahore, it divides into three branches (one of which runs close to the city), and joins the Chenab, after a course of 450 miles from its source. Though not deep, it is navigable from Lahore to its confluence with the Chenab, but its sinuosities almost double the distance. It is a foul river, its water having in some parts a red tinge, and it is much studded with sand-banks, many of which are dangerous quicksands. It traverses generally a flat country, but near Lahore its banks sometimes rise to a perpendicular height of forty feet.

The Beas, or Beah,* the Hyphasis of Arrian, the Bibasis of Ptolemy, has a course of little more than 200 miles. It rises in Lahoul, in the Himalayas, $32^{\circ} 24'$ N. lat., and $77^{\circ} 12'$ E. long., and takes a southerly course, from the Ritanka pass, for forty miles, then turns sharply to the west, to Mundee, and, receiving a considerable accession from mountain streams, reaches Nadaun, whence it inclines from the west to the north-west, for about eighty miles, and entering the plains of the Punjab, in N. lat. $32^{\circ} 5'$, E. long. $75^{\circ} 25'$, it bends to the south, and holds a southerly and south-westerly course, for eighty miles, till its bright blue waters mingle with those of the turbid Sutluj, in lat. $31^{\circ} 12'$, long. $74^{\circ} 56'$, three miles above Huree-ke-puttun. The united waters, which do not commix for a mile below the junction, form a large stream, the actual channel, according to Burnes, exceeding a mile and a half in breadth. Both the Ravi and the Beas rise to the west of the Chenab, although they run east of it in the plains, being included, as it were, within an arch or semi-circular sweep, made by the latter river.

The Sutluj, or Sutluk,* the Hesudrus of antiquity, is the most eastern of the five rivers. The exact locality of its source has not yet been ascertained; but it is supposed to be at a very great elevation on the southern face of the Kailasa range, in about $31^{\circ} 5' \text{ N. lat.}$, $81^{\circ} 6' \text{ E. long.}$, whence it flows into the sacred lake Rawan-hrad, issuing again from its north-western extremity, and taking its rapid course, as a raging torrent, in that direction, for about 150 miles, through a country almost inaccessible to man, as far as Nako, lat. $31^{\circ} 50'$, where it receives the Leh, or Spiti river, from the north. The rocky gulf, at the confluence of the Sutluj and Leh river, where the bed of the stream is still 8,494 feet above the level of the sea, is described by travellers as a scene of awful sublimity, and one of the wonders of the natural world. After rounding the outer Himalayas, it splits into many streams, but re-unites in one channel as it approaches the Sewalik range, its general course being to the south-west. Shortly after leaving Belaspore, $31^{\circ} 21'$ N. lat., $76^{\circ} 41'$ E. long., the river makes a sweep to the north-west, then south-west, then south-east. A few miles above Roopur, in lat. $30^{\circ} 58'$, long. $76^{\circ} 29'$, it emerges from the hills in a variety of distinct streams, and enters the plain of the Punjab, no longer retaining its blue mountain tinge, but expanding into a muddy river, running through a swampy country: when full, it is 1,500 feet wide and 30 feet deep.* From Roopur it flows nearly west to Lodiana, where it divides into two branches. From the ferry of Philoor, where its breadth is 2,100 feet, the river is navigable at all seasons; but its channel is variable, the bed of the river often changing several miles in a single season. The narrowness of the deep channel is a great impediment to navigation, but steamers have ascended to twenty miles above Lodiana. In December there are several tolerable fords between Roopur and Ferozepore, over which an army might pass, but they are all more or less dangerous. Its whole course till its junction with the Beas is 570 miles. Below this confluence, the conjoined stream bears the name of Ghara,* till at Ooch it unites with the Chenab to form the Punjnud,† “without turmoil,” the Chenab appearing as large above the conflux as below it. The water of either river is to be distinguished some miles after the junction; that of the Chenab being reddish, that of the Ghara, pale.

Until within the last fifteen years, the rivers of the Punjab were scarcely better known in Europe than by the Greek geographers.* Since the mission of Sir Alexander Burnes, in 1831, most of them have been examined from the place where they are navigable to their confluence with another stream.

The native vessels used upon these rivers are rude, but they are not ill-adapted to the peculiarities of their navigation. They differ, rather in size than in construction, upon the several streams. The zohruk, the nawuk, and the dondah are nearly all flat-bottomed, and, though clumsily formed, are strong and safe. The first, used mostly upon the Indus, is square-built, fore and aft, rounded at both ends, the burthen from forty to fifty tons, and carries no sail. The nawuk and dondah are found principally upon the Chenab and the Sutluj; they have pointed bows and sterns. Where the navigation of the Jelum commences, the boats are large, the planks being put together with great nicety, but they have no sails. The boats of the Sutluj and Beas are flat-bottomed, shaped like a snuffers-tray, with a high projecting peak, and from five to twelve tons burthen. Their make is clumsy; not a nail is used in their construction, but they are admirably adapted for passage-boats, and cannot be upset. For long trips, there are the Indus boats, which are better built, and not only navigate safely to the very mouth of the river, but have comfortable cabins for passengers. These boats have one huge sail, with bamboos tied together for yards, which is hoisted when the wind is fair. But the main dependence is upon the force of the current in descending, and the track-rope upwards is drawn by the boatmen (called mullahs—the Ganges boatmen are called dandis), a fine-looking, hard-working class of Musulmans.

The natives resort to more simple modes of crossing the rivers of the Punjab, upon inflated buffalo and sheep-skins, the mouth of which is sewn up, and the legs made airtight, below the knee and hock-joints, so that the figure of the animal is somewhat preserved, and they are thus easily carried. Burnes says, he has seen upon the Indus,

Of late years, steam navigation has been introduced upon the Indus, the Ravi, and the Sutluj. Notwithstanding the narrowness of the deep channels in this river, three large steamers have been to Ferozepore, and one to Macheewala, twenty miles above Lodiana. It is not doubted that boats built for the purpose could navigate the Sutluj, throughout the year, to Roopur.†

CHAPTER II.

THE DOABS.

THE Punjab is an extensive, flat plain, with mountains to the north and west, and open to the south and east. The rivers, the courses and characteristics of which have been just described, divide the Punjab, properly so called, into doabs, or intra-fluvial tracts. The names of these doabs (except those between the Indus and the Jelum, and the Beas and Sutluj) are compounded of the names of both rivers: a fact noticed by the Greek writers, furnishing one evidence, amongst many, of the minute accuracy of their descriptions. "The greater part of this country," says Arrian, "is level and champaign, which is occasioned, as some suppose, by the rivers working down mud during their inundations, so that some of the countries have borrowed their names from the rivers which pass through them." Thus the tract between the Chenab and Behut (Jelum) is named the Chenut doab; that between the Ravi and the Chenab, the Reechna doab; and that between the Beas and the Ravi, the Bari doab.

The district lying between the Indus and the Jelum (called the Sindsagur doab), 147 miles broad in the widest part, whilst it is the largest, is the most sterile and least inhabited, abounding with undulating bare eminences, and rugged declivities. To the north and north-centre, it is intersected by many ranges and ridges of hills, between which, however, are rich valleys. Dr. Jameson says, from Rotas to Mari, on the Indus, the whole country consists of extensive plains, surrounded by mountains, in general barren in the extreme. To the south extends the great desert, 250 miles long, and between 30 and 40 wide, to Multan on one side, and Dera Ghazi Khan on the other. Towards Mittunkote, in the narrow tract, cultivation increases, the soil being rich; but the chief produce of this doab is derived from its salt-mines, between Jelalpore and Pind Dadan Khan. The two rivers, when flowing in deep beds, with high, steep banks, cannot be employed in irrigation. Great part of the country is covered with thickets and jungle. Near the town of Jelum, upon the river of that name, it is broken by ravines and irregular ridges. The soil is clay, much intermixed with sand. Between Jelum and Rotas, the country is level and cultivated; beyond Rotas it is rough and broken, with occasional cultivation, but not of great extent. The land below where the Indus joins the Punjab rivers is of the richest character, particularly on the east bank.

The derajats (or camps) of Ghazi Khan and Ismael Khan are beyond the Indus; but the plains are occupied by the Sikhs.

The Sind doab is a very strong country; the northern, from its mountainous character, and the southern part being a desert, without water. After crossing the Dunnee plains, the traveller finds himself entangled in formidable ravines. The people of this doab are called Sind Singh.

The Chenut doab, between the Jelum and the Chenab, is in one part only forty-six miles broad. It is level, except where the extension of the Great Salt Range, which springs from the root of the Sufeed Koh, crosses the Indus at Karabagh, and reaches to the Jelum, terminating in low hills on the left bank of this river. Burnes describes it as "a sterile waste of underwood." The country for the most part is covered with jungle, amongst which lie miserable, dirty villages, under the shade of tamarinds and acacias, surrounded by fields of wheat, gram, jowari (holcus sorghum), cotton-plant, and sugar-cane. The soil is in general light and sandy; it is scantily irrigated by wells, the water from which is raised by the common Persian wheel. Numerous herds of cattle, camels, sheep, and goats feed upon the grass and weeds. The country has a wretched aspect in the higher parts; but where the rivers unite in the Punj-nud, the pasture is rich, extensive grass plains appear, and the banks of the river are studded with numerous hamlets. Between the lower Chenab and the Indus, there is a large desert tract; but the banks of the Chenab round Multan are highly cultivated. The Sikhs in this doab are distinguished by the name of Dhanigheb Singh, and sometimes Gujarat Singh.

The Reechna doab, between the Chenab and the Ravi, is seventy-six miles in its widest part, and consists of an arid plain, the soil light and sandy, capable of being converted into a most fertile tract, and of producing any crops, by irrigation ; but, although better cultivated and more fertile than the Chenut doab, it is now, to the extent of at least one-third, either thur (desert), or overgrown with jungle, the only cultivated land being in the immediate vicinity of the towns and villages. The country between Trimo, on the Chenab, and Toolumba, on the Ravi, is a sheet of hard clay, with clumps of tamarisk and other desert shrubs, not a blade of grass appearing beyond the banks of the rivers. The water from the wells (which are thirty feet deep) is scarce, and always fetid and noxious. Large neglected canals prove that, in former times, navigation was an object of greater attention. The Sikhs in this doab have the designation of Dharpi Singh.

The Bari doab (sometimes called Manja, whence the Sikhs resident here are called Manja Singh), between the Ravi and Beas, the narrowest of the doabs, being only forty-four miles broad, is the most neglected ; although susceptible of the highest cultivation, and although the two capitals of the Sikh state, Amritsur and Lahore, are included within it. Even between these two cities the country is covered with low bushes, and but partially cultivated, especially to the north-east. Upon approaching Lahore, the country looks as if purposely devastated. The Sutluj, by its extensive inundations in the rainy season, remedies in some measure the apathy of man, by producing spontaneous fertility. The soil is generally a hard, indurated clay, sometimes gravelly, producing thorny shrubs and brambles, upon which herds of nilghaos find subsistence. Lower down, the soil is strong, and rather fertile, but little cultivated, and overrun with jungle and small wood. Burnes states that the soil amply repays the labour, for, such is its strength, that a crop of wheat, before yielding its grain, is twice mown down as fodder for cattle, and then produces an abundant harvest. Irrigation, which would make this tract a garden, is totally disregarded, and the canals constructed by the Mahomedan conquerors of the country are suffered to fall into decay.

The Jullinder (or Jalendra) doab, the smallest, between the Beas and Sutluj, is in a better condition than the other intra-fluvian tracts, and is said to be excelled in climate and productions by no province of India. From the town of Jullinder to the banks of the Sutluj, the country is highly cultivated and well-peopled. Villages are numerous near the river, and the peasantry appear contented and happy. The soil is light, but productive; water is found in abundance near the surface. Burnes describes the cultivated parts of the country as resembling a vast meadow, entirely free from underwood, wheat-fields extending for miles without a hedge. This luxuriant landscape, however, is elsewhere exchanged for immense tracts of jungle.

Between the Sutluj and Lodiana, the country is very low, not alluvial, but sandy, and intersected by nullas, one of which was the bed of the river fifty years ago. The aptitude of the Sutluj to change its course, which has been already noticed, creates many a bitter feud; a single season often changes the bed several miles, and crops sown on one side of the stream may be reaped by a proprietor on the other. In the plains, observes Major Lawrence,* the Sutluj runs through a line of country six miles broad, and from twenty to one hundred feet lower than the general surrounding level. This tract is called khadir, as the high adjoining lands are called bangur. Through any portion of this bed of six miles, the river is liable to force a new channel, and every year does, more or less, change its course. The waters begin to rise in April, and towards July come down in so full a stream, as often to inundate the villages on the banks. The general influence of these floods is beneficial, the low

This tendency to desert their channels is a property of most, if not all, of the Punjab rivers. Bands of sand traverse the country, north and south, indicating the old beds of rivers; the Ravi, which, twenty years ago, washed the city of Lahore, runs now in a channel three miles to the northward; the Chenab, which, within twelve years, ran close to the town of Ramnuggur, is now four miles distant, and the same remark applies to the Jelum.

The Sikhs of the Jalendra doab are called Doaba Singh, and those on the left bank of the Sutluj, Malawa Singh.

There must either have been some exaggeration in the early accounts of the fertility of the Punjab, or its condition in this respect has greatly deteriorated.* Mr. Elphinstone says that, except near the rivers, no part will bear a comparison with the British provinces in India; that the soil, in the part he passed through, was generally sandy, and by no means rich, and on the whole, not one-third of the country he saw was cultivated.† Dr. Jameson represents the plain of the Punjab as a waste, comparatively speaking, with occasional cultivation. “Proceeding from Lahore to Jelalpore,” he says, “we pass over vast uncultivated tracts, with here and there, in the centre of the bushy jungle, a small village, with some rich cultivated fields around; now and then, breaking up the monotony of the flat plain, we meet with hillocks, marking the sites of towns and villages which are now no more, or deep ravines, the haunt of the wolf and the jackal.”‡ Mr. Vigne, who crossed the plains of the Punjab repeatedly, says, they are, generally speaking, but partially cultivated. In the winter months, he adds, the land around the villages is covered with green patches of wheat and barley, divided by small furrows, which are filled with water by means of the Persian wheel. The villages appear a dusty confusion of mud walls. A few trees are seen in the gardens or near the wells; but the plains, which are more or less sandy, are scantily covered with the thorny camel-plant, stunted byr-apple, or jujube, and occasionally an isolated babul (mimosa Arabica) may be seen. This, he says, is the general aspect of the Punjab.*

* Burnes, Travels in Bokhara, vol. iii. p. 184. Lawrence, Adventures in the Punjab, vol. ii. p. 117. Von Orlich, Travels in India, vol. i. p. 159. Calcutta Review, No. III. art. 5.

The soil varies in a remarkable degree from stiff clay to sand, mixed with each other in variable proportions, and with vegetable matter. Between Jelalpore and Pind Dadun Khan, it consists of a black rich loam, the finest Dr. Jameson saw in the Punjab.

No country in the East, perhaps in the world, enjoys in a greater proportion to its extent the means of artificial irrigation; although, as before remarked, some of its rivers flow in deep beds, the simple mechanical contrivances of the natives might diffuse the waters of the others over the sandy and clayey tracts. Water, however, is seldom raised artificially for irrigation; when it is so raised, the well-known Persian wheel is employed, worked by bullocks or camels, the machinery being placed over a khureez,* or a cut in the river's bank. In a dry country, land is of little value that is not irrigated by river inundation, or by wells; so that landed possessions in the Sikh country are calculated not by measurement, but by the number of wells. Each well is protected by a tower, into which the husbandman flies in case of emergency. These towers are often met with in tracts once cultivated, but now desert wilds.

The inferior towns throughout the Punjab are, generally speaking, only large villages,

containing a fort, or the residence of a Sikh chief. On the right bank of the Jelum, near Jelalpore, where the soil is fertile, the villages, perched upon the hills, are romantic in their situation, and the houses, which are comfortable within, are plastered with a grey-coloured earth, which gives them a cleanly external appearance. The dwellings generally of the Punjabis are flat, or terrace-roofed, built either of sun-dried bricks in a wooden frame, or they consist of a wooden frame covered with mud. The villages, in some parts, and even in the vicinity of Lahore, are temporary, being the moveable hamlets of the pastoral Cathi, or Juns.

The climate, excepting in the northern and mountainous tracts, is dry, very little rain falling in the plains, especially in the south. On the hills, as well as towards the sea, and where the monsoon is felt, as far as Lahore, the rains are sometimes heavy. In the winter the weather is cold, and even frosty during the night. The heat in summer is intense, and scarcely tolerable to Europeans, who have experienced near Lahore, in June, a temperature of 113° after ten o'clock, A.M. "I never felt any thing like the heat," Mr. Osborne says; "even before three o'clock in the morning, on the 16th of June, the thermometer must have been upwards of 100°, and a stifling, sultry atmosphere, that made it painful to breathe."* Baron Hügel describes the heat of the Punjab as "dreadful."

Nothing like an accurate calculation of the amount of the population inhabiting the Punjab has hitherto been given; there are, indeed, no materials upon which to found such a calculation. Their aggregate number has been roughly estimated at from 3,500,000 to 5,000,000.† By Burnes and all travellers, the Punjab is considered to be a poorly-peopled country, in proportion to its habitable area and its capabilities.

The people are of various races; the hilly provinces in the north are inhabited by Tibetans and Cashmerians; and in the plains, Patans, the descendants of Afghan conquerors, and the progeny of Hindus from ultra-

Sutluj India, are mixed with Jats and Cathis, who compose the bulk of the Punjabis, properly so called. The Khalas, or Sikhs, do not amount to much more than a fourth part of the entire population; there are none westward of the Jelum, and to the eastward of Lahore, where they are said to predominate, Burnes states that they do not compose one-third. "It is astonishing," says Major Lawrence, "how seldom a Sikh is met in what is called the Sikh territory."

Historical associations of much interest attach to the Jat race, which is widely disseminated throughout India, under the names of Jit, Jut, and Jat; by the latter they are known on the Jumna and Ganges; by that of Jut, on the Indus and in Saurashtra, and as Jits in the Punjab. Evidence from the history of different nations, too strong to be resisted, identifies them with the Scythian Getes, as they are called by classical authors, Yuě-che, or Yuě-te, as they are denominated by the historians of China, whose original seat was in Central Asia, and who, after extending their authority over the modern Afghanistan, invaded India in the fifth century, and established themselves in the Punjab and in Rajpootana.* The Jits continued to form powerful communities in these countries, and on the east bank of the Indus, for six centuries later; Mahmud of Ghuzni encountered a desperate resistance from them, in 1026, in the neighbourhood of Multan; and Baber complains that, in his progress through the Punjab, he was assailed by prodigious numbers of Jits. All the traditions of the Jits point to the regions west of the Indus as the cradle of their race. "A Jit informed me," says Colonel Tod, "that their wuttun was far beyond the Five Rivers." De Guignes and Remusat, from Asiatic authorities, have traced the invasions or migrations of the Yuč-te from Tartary to the Punjab in the fifth and sixth centuries of our era; and the overthrow of the great

* Colonel Tod (Annals of Rajasthan, vol. i. p. 795) has published an inscription, which fixes the year A.D. 409 as the date of the colonization of the Punjab by Jits from the Jaxartes. This was the exact period when the Chinese traveller Fă-hëen was in India, and he mentions the fact of an invasion of the Punjab by the Getes, or Yuč-te.

Scythian empire in Central Asia by Timur, in A.D. 1388, occasioned a further influx of Getes into the countries of Western India. "This celebrated race," observes Colonel Tod, "appears to have been the most numerous, as well as the most conspicuous, tribe of ancient Asia, from the days of Tomyris and Cyrus, to those of the present Jit prince of Lahore," namely, Runjeet Singh.

The agricultural peasantry of the Punjab are mostly of this race. The Cathis are a pastoral tribe, and as Jun, their other name, denotes, live an erratic life. These people have likewise an historical reputation, since they are incontestably the Cathæi who offered so determined a resistance to the great Macedonian invader. They were then confined to the country near the Punjnud ; their own traditions fix their emigration from the south-east part of the valley of the Indus about the eighth century. Colonel Tod* describes the genuine Cathi as "a fine specimen of purely natural production ; his manly form, open countenance, and independent gait, forming a striking contrast to the careworn peasantry of other districts." Captain McMurdo* says, "a character possessed of more energy than a Cathi, does not exist." With an athletic frame, their height often exceeds six feet. They have light hair and blue eyes, which Tod (who believed them to be a tribe originally from Central Asia) not unreasonably regards as evidence of a Scythic origin, though Burnes considers the Cathi (or Kat-tias), "a tall, stout, and handsome race," as the aborigines of the country.† They live in scattered villages, and move their houses from place to place, rearing immense herds of buffaloes and camels, but scarcely ever condescending to cultivate the soil. Their habits are likewise predatory.

In the upper part of the Jelum, and in the town of that name, the people are mostly Mahomedans, and though much intermixed with Cashmerians, are darker and worse looking.‡ Higher up that river, the inhabitants of the country are exclusively Mahomedans; and at Bhalani, where the navigation of the Jelum begins, the population consists of Rajpoots, "idle, inhospitable, and arrogant."* Lower down the same river, are found the pastoral Cathis, seldom at a great distance from the rivers except in the rainy season; but they extend from the banks of the Jelum across the whole country of the Punjab, and even to Delhi. Many of the villages on the Ravi, which is peopled from its mouth, are merely temporary encampments, or moveable hamlets, of this tribe. On the banks of the Sutluj, where it enters the Punjab, the peasantry consists of Jats, Hindus, and Mahomedans, with a few Sikhs. The Mahomedans in this part are either Jats, or converts from Hinduism, and Burnes remarks, as a curious fact, that the Mahomedans predominate on the southern bank, in the vicinity of the Hindus.† The reason probably is, that the oppression of the Sikhs, who cherish a hereditary dislike towards the Mahomedans, causes them to emigrate to the south. Near Lodiana, the inhabitants are exclusively agricultural, but after the Sutluj has been joined by the Beas, the habits of the people are predatory. They are known under various denominations, Dogur, Julmairi, Salairi, &c., and by the general one of Raat, and they live in perpetual hostility with each other. A large proportion of the Hindu population are of Rajpoot descent. "We have often," says Major Lawrence,* "been amused at hearing the wild Goojurs, Dogurs, and Rangurs, tell tales of their Chohan and Rhatore ancestors." The predatory character seems to attach to many of the tribes inhabiting the banks of all the rivers in their lower course.

The most remarkable circumstance in the population of the Punjab is the paucity of Sikhs in a country ruled by them. The mother country of the Khalsas is the tract between the Ravi and Sutluj; but few are to be found thirty miles below Lahore, and none beyond the Jelum. The entire number of the Sikhs throughout the Punjab is not supposed to exceed 500,000.

The men in the Manja or Bari doab, between the Ravi and Beas, are reputed to be the bravest and most warlike of the Punjabis. The Sikhs who inhabit the country between the Sutluj and Jumna are called Malawa Singh, a title conferred upon them for their extraordinary gallantry, under their leader Banda, the successor of Guru Govind, the founder of the Sikh nation. The Malawa Sikhs are almost all converts from the Hindu tribes of Jats and Gujurs.

“There is, perhaps, no inland country of the globe,” says Burnes, “which possesses greater facilities for commerce than the Punjab, and there are few more rich in the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms. Its productions relieve it from any great dependence on external supply, whilst it can carry on a traffic with the neighbouring countries of Persia and Tartary, China and India.” Its staple commodities of trade are the shawl manufactures of Cashmere; but the Multan silks, manufactured from imported raw silk (for the worm is not reared in the province), enjoy a high reputation in the Indian market. Lahore and Amritsur participate with Multan in the manufacture of satins. The cotton cloths of the eastern portion of the Punjab, though inferior in appearance to the British, are stronger and more durable, as well as cheaper.* The finer cloths are exported to the south of the Sutluj. The salt-mines furnish an extensive article of trade, the supply being apparently inexhaustible. This rock salt is stated by Dr. Jameson to be so pure as only to require grinding. It varies in colour from white to flesh or brick red; it is granular, the concretions being very large and compact, so much so, that ornamental articles are cut out of it.† The geological structure of the country affords reason to believe that, when its mineral resources are explored, other metals besides iron, which is found in great quantity, and of excellent quality, will be discovered. Gold is obtained from the sands of the Indus. Between Attock and Kalabagh, about 300 persons are employed in washing the sand for gold, which occurs in small flattened grains. Coal may be procured in several parts of the Punjab, where it is not used as a fuel, but, strange to say, as a medicine.

The chief agricultural products are sugar, indigo, cotton, tobacco, and opium; rice (which is not suited to the palates of the people), wheat, barley, gram, moong (phaseolus mungo), mut (phaseolus aconitifolius), bajri (holcus spicatus), and other grain: and most of the vines and fruits common to Europe are found in the northern provinces of Cashmere and Kishtewar.

CHAPTER III.

EARLY HISTORY OF THE PUNJAB.

THE earliest accounts of the Punjab are given by the historians of the expedition of Alexander the Great, in the fourth century before the Christian era. Although the rulers of ancient Persia extended their conquests over part of India, and the Indian possessions of Darius Hystaspes, the most valuable of his twenty satrapies, are supposed to have included the Punjab, we have few recorded facts upon this point, and no testimony beyond the authority of Herodotus, and the doubtful voyage of Scylax down the Indus.* The peculiar character of the country, and the general fidelity and accuracy of the Greek writers, permit us to trace the movements of the Macedonian conqueror with more precision than might have been expected, considering the great lapse of time, the loss of the original journal of Megasthenes, and the corruptions of the ancient texts.

Alexander entered India at the very point where it is most easily assailed. He passed the Indus in the district of Peucelaotis (as Arrian writes the name), or Peucolaitis (according to Strabo), and Rennell supposes that he crossed the river at Attock, where it was passed by subsequent conquerors. The bridge of boats which had been prepared by Hephæstion and their ally Taxiles, as described by Arrian,* corresponds very nearly with that used at the present day. Boats are fixed in the stream a short distance from each other, by skeleton frameworks of wood filled with stones, and the communication is completed by planks covered with mud.† Having effected his passage in the month of May, B.C. 327, he halted his army for thirty days, to refresh the soldiers, who had undergone severe service in fighting their way to the river through the warlike and ferocious tribes which inhabited the mountainous districts on the other side.

* Lib. v. c. 7.

This portion of India was then partitioned amongst a great number of petty princes, independent of, and often in hostility with, each other. At this critical period, two of the most powerful of these rajas, named Taxiles and Porus, were at war, and the former, in order to crush his adversary, joined the invader. The territory of Taxiles appears to have been the doab between the Indus and the Hydaspes (Jelum); that of Porus, who had subdued most of his neighbours, extended as far as the Hyphasis.

Alexander had an army of 135,000 men, 15,000 being cavalry, with a great number of elephants. This force included a large body of hardy mercenaries from the hills west of the Indus, and north of the Punjab, under a chief named Ambisares. At the head of this force he marched to the Hydaspes, which he reached in the month of August. On the other (left) side of the river Porus was posted, with 30,000 infantry, 4,000 cavalry, 200 elephants, and 300 war-chariots. Alexander, finding the river much swollen by the rains, sent for boats from the Indus, which were brought over-land, in the meanwhile amusing Porus by marching and counter-marching his troops along the bank of the river, as if searching for a ford. On the arrival of the boats, he passed the river at Jelalpore, 114 miles from Attock, where it is in the rainy season upwards of a mile broad, and never fordable. When the mission under Mr. Elphinstone crossed the river at this very pass, on their return, its present features were found to tally exactly with the description given by the Greek writers. In the battle which ensued, Porus was defeated and taken prisoner. It was in this part of the Hydaspes, on its right, or western bank, that the conqueror, in commemoration of this event, built the cities of Nicæa and Bucephalia.*

After the defeat of Porus, Alexander marched across the doab between the Hydaspes and the Acesines, described as a flat and rich country, through the territories of Porus; passed the latter river, and advanced to the Hydraotes (Ravi), where he captured Sangala, represented to be a strong city of the Cathæi (the modern Cathi), the most valiant and skilful in war of all the Indians. A body of the Cathæi was encamped before the city, which Alexander, having defeated them in a pitched battle, took and razed. Sangala is supposed to have been situated to the south-east of Lahore; and Burnes states, that there are the remains of a city answering to Sangala in the vicinity south-east of that capital. From hence, the conqueror marched to the Hyphasis (Beas), whether above, or as more probable below, its junction with the Sutluj, is not quite clear. His historians do not mention the latter river, and they allude to a desert beyond the Hyphasis, which exists below the conflux of the two rivers. Here the soldiers received such appalling accounts of the deserts they would have to pass, and of the countless hosts assembled to oppose their progress, that, struck with consternation, and exhausted by fatigue and suffering, they refused to march farther, and Alexan-

Before he commenced his retrograde march, we are told, he raised upon the south-eastern bank of the Hyphasis twelve altars of hewn stone, each seventy-five feet high, to commemorate as many victories, upon which he offered sacrifices: "they were equal in height," says Arrian, "to towers, but far exceeded them in bulk." Curiosity has impelled travellers to make diligent search for some remains of these monuments, but hitherto without success. Apollonius Tyaneus, according to Philostratus, saw these altars in the first century of the Christian era, when a king of Greek race, named Phraotes, was reigning in the Punjab.† Burnes,‡ however, made extensive researches in the country below the union of the two rivers, wandering about for several days, but could find no relic of these colossal altars. Mr. Atkinson thinks they may be found in the vicinity of the British cantonment of Ferozepore.*

This, therefore, was the extreme limit of Alexander's progress eastward. He recrossed successively the Hydraotes, the Acesines, and the Hydaspes, where a large fleet had been prepared for a descent of that river. The boats, 800 in number, were built of timber procured from the mountains, and Burnes says that in none of the other Punjab rivers are such trees (deodar, a kind of cedar) floated down, nor do there exist such facilities for constructing vessels, as in the Jelum. In November, B.C. 327, Alexander embarked on board one of these vessels, and whilst the fleet, which he commanded in person, dropped down the stream, two divisions of the army marched along the Hydaspes, and a third along the Acesines, to the confluence of these streams, where the fleet was much shattered. The Greek historians, as well as those of Timur, describe the confluence as accompanied by terrific violence; whereas Burnes, who saw the waters at their height, says that the junction is effected "with a murmuring noise," but the velocity of the current is inconsiderable. The army was now distributed into four divisions, three of which marched at some distance from each other in parallel columns, whilst the fourth, under the king, advanced inland, from the river, to drive the Malli into the other divisions. On arriving at the junction of the Hydraotes with the Acesines, the king had several combats with this tribe, whose capital he took, pursuing them to the other side of the Hydraotes. In these conflicts Alexander exhibited much courage, exposing himself to great personal danger, and was severely wounded with an arrow. Thence he marched into the countries of King Musicanus, King Oxycanus,* the Sindomanni (the Sindians), and other districts on the Lower Indus. Subsequently, deputies from the Malli and the Oxydracæ came, with presents, to solicit peace, alleging, by way of excuse for their obstinate resistance to the Greeks, their strong love of liberty.

Descending the Indus, Alexander arrived at Patala (Tatta*), “where the river divides into two great branches.” According to Arrian,† Patala, in the Indian tongue, signified the same as Delta in the Greek. Alexander proceeded down one of the branches (probably the Piti) to the sea, and afterwards returned to Patala, whence, leaving his fleet with Nearchus, he marched with his army to Persia by way of Gedrosia (Mekran) and Caramania (Kerman), in September, B.C. 326.

The political state of the country at that period may be discerned even in the loose notices left us. Arrian states, that there was then a family, enjoying supreme dominion in India, which derived their pedigree from Budæus, probably Buddha, whose creed extended widely over this and the neighbouring countries down to the fifth century of our era. The authority of this paramount Indian sovereign, however, did not reach the Punjab, which was severed into separate kingdoms and principalities. That of Musicanus, we are told, was governed by Bramins, and Burnes conjectures that the powerful kingdom of Alore, or Arore, which extended from the ocean to Cashmere, and from Candahar to Kanouj, ruled by Bramins so late as the seventh century, was the kingdom of Musicanus. The Oxydracæ (probably the Cutchis), and the Malli (no doubt the people of Multan, which is still called Malli-than, 'the place of the Malli'),—who, though generally at variance, combined against Alexander, and brought against him an army of 90,000 men,—seem to have possessed much power in the south-western parts of the Punjab. Besides these nations, the Greek writers mention seven independent states in the country of the Five Rivers.

Alexander had not time to establish any system of government in the vast provinces he conquered in the East; where his authority was acknowledged, it was exercised through military commanders, who, after his death (323 B. C.), became, in the natural course of things, and by the force of circumstances, supreme. Seleucus, governor of Babylon, not only secured that country, but extended his power, by the destruction of his competitors, as far as the Indus, which he crossed, B. C. 305, to attack Sandracottus (identified with the Chandragupta of Indian history), who had expelled the Greek garrisons from the Punjab, which was thus restored to native rule. Seleucus is said to have passed the Hesudrus (Sutluj), and, after gaining several victories over Sandracottus, being suddenly recalled to defend his own territories, to have concluded a treaty of peace with that monarch, to whom he ceded the Punjab and valley of the Indus as far as Peshawur.*

The discoveries which have been recently made, through the medium of the Arian and Greek (bilingual) inscriptions upon coins of monarchs hitherto unknown to history, found in Afghanistan and the Punjab, in conjunction with records of indubitable authority engraven upon rocks in various parts of India, and especially at Kafir-dihari (a village about forty miles from Peshawur, in the country of the Eusofzai Afghans), have diffused a new light upon Græco-Indian and Scytho-Indian history, and enable us partially to fill up a vast chasm in the transactions of the Punjab.*

Antiochus the Great, according to the Greek and Roman historians, invaded India B.C. 206, and formed an alliance with Sophagasenes, the sovereign of that country. It is now ascertained, from the evidence before referred to, that this sovereign was Asoka, or Piyadasi, king of Magadha (grandson of Chandragupta), who ascended the throne B.C. 247. He was a zealous Buddhist, and in one of his edicts still extant, engraved on stone, he expressly mentions by name Antiochus, the Greek king (Antiyako Yona Raja), who, it seems, had favoured, if not adopted, the Buddhistic opinions. Eucratides the Great, another Bactrian king, invaded India B.C. 165, and annexed the Punjab to his dominions. Upon his death, his vast empire is supposed to have been broken into several independent kingdoms, one of which, ruled by Menander and Apollodotus, included the Punjab. A list of kings has been obtained from recently discovered coins, of Greek mintage, bearing Arian inscriptions on the reverse, ranging from 153 to 120 B.C., who are supposed, upon good grounds, to have been sovereigns of the Punjab, the valley of the Indus, and Cabul.

The disruption of the empire of Eucratides enabled Mithridates I. (a Parthian monarch) to seize upon a large part of his territories; and he made a successful invasion of India, about B.C. 140, and there is reason to believe that satraps, or governors, were left by him in possession of the Punjab, where coins of Parthian princes have been found,

Towards the commencement of our era, this part of India appears to have been overrun by successive hordes of Scythians, whom some mighty revolutions in Tartary had expelled from their native seats. The Chinese historians say, that, about a century before our era, the Yuě-te (Getes, or Jits), who occupied a vast country between China and the Tëen-shan, or Celestial Mountains, were, after many sanguinary wars, expelled by the Heung-noos, or Huns, and forced into the countries of the Oxus and Jaxartes, whence they extended themselves to Afghanistan and the borders of India. The Indus was only a temporary barrier, and they appear to have occupied the whole country of the Five Rivers. These conclusions, heretofore

Prinsep, and their bearing upon Arian, Indo-Bactrian, and Indian history, elucidated by the learned comments of Prof. Lassen and Prof. Wilson, in Mr. H. T. formed from meagre historical evidence, are now confirmed by the discovery of coins of Punjab rulers, whose names, Azes and Azilises, which have no affinity with Greek or Hindu nomenclature, denote a barbarian origin. The great Indian sovereign, Vicramaditya, expelled the Scythian princes from the Punjab, and his era (B.C. 56) is supposed to commence from a great victory obtained by him over the barbarians in that country, which completed his conquest of all Hindustan. His empire, however, fell to pieces after his death, when new hordes of Scythians overran the Punjab, and established, about 20 B.C., a dynasty of kings bearing the name of Kadphises. Coins of these kings have been recovered, and their barbarous effigies clearly distinguish them from Greeks or Hindus. This dynasty is supposed to have reigned throughout the whole of the first century of our era, when it was subverted by a fresh swarm of Scythians, under the Kanerki kings. Between these dynasties, however, there is evidence, from the testimony of Apollonius Tyaneus, related by Philostratus (before referred to), that a Græco-

Parthian king, named Phraotes, reigned in the Punjab, which fact is supported by coins of Undopherres and Gondophares,* both called, in the Arian legends upon the coins, Phrahata.

The power of the Kanerki kings in the Punjab must have continued for some centuries; for in the topes or tumuli which have been opened in that country, Kanerki coins have been found along with those of Kadphises and other predecessors of the race, mixed with coins of the Sassanian monarchs of the third and fourth centuries of our era.†

* The date, as well as name, of this king, Mr. H. T. Prinsep remarks, is confirmed by a tradition regarding St. Thomas, of whom it is said, in the Aurea Sacra, that he was appointed by a king of India, named Gondoferus, to build a place of worship.

† These topes, remarkable as monuments of antiquity in the Punjab, and which have furnished the most irrefragable historical evidences, deserve some particular notice here. They are evidently sepulchral monuments, erected for the preservation of the remains of persons of distinction after their bodies had been consumed. They are found not only in the Punjab, but in Bameean and Afghanistan; particularly in the neighbourhood of Cabul. They consist of mounds, on which is erected a cupola, supported by walls of masonry, more or less in a Grecian style of architecture.

Amongst

Amongst the ruins of Manikyala (now the name of a small village on the high road from Attock to Lahore, about half-way between Attock and Jelum), an ancient city, which, from the abundance of coins found there, must have been a place of great importance, probably the capital of the country of Taxiles, is a large tope, eighty feet high, and about 320 feet in circumference. It is solidly built of quarried stones, with lime cement, in a simple style, the only ornament being a range of small columns near the base, having rams' heads for their capitals. Fifteen smaller topes are in the same locality. All these monuments were opened by Generals Ventura and Court, when in the service of Runjeet Singh. The smaller topes were first explored, and in one, which was pierced from the summit by General Court, were found four copper coins, three feet only from the upper surface, one of Kadphises, the others of Kanerkis. Ten feet lower, a rectangular cell was reached, built with dressed stones, firmly united by mortar; in the centre stood a copper urn, round which were placed symmetrically eight medals of copper, much corroded, two being of the Kadphises type, and the rest Kanerkis. The urn was carefully enveloped in a wrapper of white linen, which fell to shreds. In the copper urn was a smaller silver one (the intervening space being filled with a moist earthy paste), quite corroded, so as to break into pieces. Within this urn was a much smaller vessel of gold, embedded in the same brown paste, along with seven genuine silver Roman coins. The gold vessel contained attested not only by Fă-héen, a Chinese traveller in India early in the fifth century (who crossed the Five Rivers, and found Buddhism prevalent in that country), but by an inscrip-four small gold coins of Græco-Scythian type, all Kanerkis, and two precious stones, with four decayed pearls, bored as for ear-rings. The stone, which served as a covering to the niche containing the relics, bore inscriptions; it is now deposited in the royal library at Paris.

In the large tope, which was opened by General Ventura, in 1830, were found six coins, three feet from the surface, another at ten feet, and several at twenty feet. Lower down, the workmen reached a metal case, which was broken by their pickaxes, containing a small box of pure gold, in the centre of which was an opal. The box contained a gold coin, of the Kanerki race, a gold seal-ring, having a Pehlvi inscription, a Sassanian silver coin (supposed to be of Sapor II.), two other Sassanian coins, and a rude silver coin of India. Still lower down, other articles were found, and at fifty-four feet, three more Sassanian coins, all much corroded. At sixty-four feet, a chamber was opened, which contained a copper box, filled with a brown liquid, containing decomposed animal substance. Inside was a turned brass box, with an Arian inscription on the lid, in which were five copper coins of the Kanerki and Kenorano type, a gold cylinder, containing fragments of amber, a small gold coin of the Kanerki Koranos type, a disk of silver with Arian characters, and other articles.

tion discovered by Colonel Tod in a temple near Kotah, in Rajpootana, dated A. D. 409, which contains a memorial of a Jit prince of Salpoora, at the base of the Sewalik mountains. Colonel Tod considers it to be proved beyond a doubt, "that these Jit princes of Salpoora, in the Punjab, were the leaders of that very colony of the Yuti from the Jaxartes, who, in the fifth century, as recorded by De Guignes, crossed the Indus and possessed themselves of the Punjab."* Various indications appear in the Rajpoot annals of their conquests and settlements in this country, even as far as the Jelum.

The Mahomedan invasions of India commenced in the seventh century of our era, and the first storms broke upon the country east of the Indus. The date of A. D. 685 is fixed by Colonel Tod, from native records, as that of the earliest invasion of Rajpootana by the Moslems. In the reign of Walid (A. D. 705 to 715), Sinde was invaded, and that caliph is said to have rendered all India to the Ganges tributary to him. In A. D. 718, Mahomed-bin-Kasim, the general of Omar, vanquished and slew the prince of Sind, and conquered that country. The great kingdom of Arore was occupied by the Caliph Al-Mansoor (A. D. 754 to 775), who changed the name of its capital to Mansoorah. The celebrated Harun-al-Rashid (A. D. 786 to 809), in apportioning his immense empire amongst his sons, included in the share given to Al-Mamoon, the second son, Sind and Hindustan. In 833, this prince, then caliph, entered Western India from Zabulistan, but the Mahomedans do not appear to have obtained a footing in the country till nearly two centuries later, and in 850 Sind was the only province of India left to Motawakel, the grandson of Harun.

After Subektegin, the governor of Khorasan, had declared himself independent at Ghuzni, in A.D. 975, he carried his arms across the Indus, forcibly converting the natives to Islamism. These inroads were repeated, and in the last (A.D. 997), he was accompanied by his son, the celebrated Mahmud, who became, upon his succession to the throne of Ghuzni, the scourge of India. Twelve several invasions of that country by him are recorded, in which the bigotry and rapacity of the Mahomedans left durable traces of their inroads, in the sack and destruction of cities, the desecration and plunder of temples, and the slaughter or impoverishment of the people.

The notices which the Musulman historians give of the political condition of the Punjab shew that it was still divided into separate states. We find that the Sind-sagur doab, between the Indus and the Jelum, was the seat of a kingdom founded by the Keechi tribe of Rajpoots, the northern Chohans, whose ruler was expelled by Mahomed-bin-Kasim. The Jit king of Salpoora, in the Punjab, was driven across the Sutluj by a Musulman leader named Ferid, and a kingdom of Lahore is frequently mentioned by Ferishta, of which the city so named was the capital, and which extended to Multan.

The analogy between the condition of India at this period and at the date of the Macedonian invasion is still farther supported by the fact that, in the seventh century, the Pramara family held paramount sovereignty

The first invasion of Mahmud, A.D. 1,000, extended eastward as far as the Bari doab, and alarmed the king of Lahore, named Jeipal, a Bramin, who had formed an alliance with some of the Afghan tribes beyond the Indus, whither the arms of the Lahore prince had penetrated. His authority, according to Ferishta, was not much inferior to that of the late Runjeet Singh, for he is said to have ruled from Sirhind to Limgham, and from Cashmere to Multan. Various conflicts took place between this powerful prince and the Mahomedans; in the end, the latter were successful, and Jeipal was made a tributary to the Sultan. The next invasions took place in 1004 and 1005, when the king of Multan revolted, and was joined by the king of Lahore. The latter was conquered, and fled to Cashmere. In a subsequent year, Mahmud again expelled the king of Lahore from his dominions and overran Cashmere. From this country, in 1018, he burst with a large army upon Upper India, and took Canouj, Muttra, and Agra. In his later expeditions he captured the city of Lahore, which he gave up to pillage, and after having destroyed the celebrated temple of Somnat, in Guzerat, his last exploit was the punishment of the Jits or Jats of Multan, who made a desperate resistance, not only on land, but with a fleet of boats upon the Indus.

The son and successor of Mahmud maintained such a degree of authority as could be exercised over a remote territory, in the Punjab; but the Turks, under the Seljuk princes, gradually curtailed the power of the Ghaznivide Sultans, who, in 1049, possessed only Afghanistan and some provinces of India beyond the Jelum. In this state of things, the princes of the Punjab endeavoured to recover their independence; but Ibrahim, a vigorous prince, making a cession to the Seljukians of the territories they had taken from his family, directed his whole attention to India, and in 1080, reduced many parts; and his successor, Musaud, made Lahore the principal seat of his government. A subsequent sultan of this dynasty, Khosru, withdrew entirely from his Afghan territory, now usurped by the Gaurian princes, and made Lahore the capital of his Indian possessions. Under his successor, the Gaurian prince Mahomed invaded India, overran Multan and the provinces on both sides the Indus, penetrating as far as Lahore, overthrew the Ghaznevide dynasty reigning there, and, in 1184, substituted his own.

Mahomed of Gaur, or Ghor, leaving the government of his Indian provinces to a viceroy, returned to his capital of Ghuzni; but his absence gave the princes of India an opportunity to form a powerful combination against his authority, and when, in 1190, he returned with a formidable army of Turks, Persians, and Afghans, he encountered a force consisting of 300,000 horse, and a great body of infantry, headed by no less than 150 rajas, in Ajmer. This unwieldy army was overthrown by the Moslems. Mahomed left his general, Kutb-ud-deen, to complete the conquest of India, and in 1192, Delhi, Benares, and the whole country to the confines of Bengal, submitted to him. Kutb was declared governor of India, and he established the authority of his master in the south-western provinces. In an insurrection of the Ghikers, or Gakkars, a tribe of Hindus, who attempted to recover their independence, and actually marched towards Lahore, Mahomed was murdered in his tent. As he left no family, Kutb became sovereign of India, and added Bengal and Bahar to his dominions. Upon his death, in 1210, his ill-compacted empire fell to pieces, but the fragments were re-united by Shams-ud-deen Altumsh, who extended his authority from the Ganges to the Indus.

An event now happened which changed the whole face of Asia. Chengiz Khan, at the head of his hordes of Monguls, after overrunning and desolating the great Mahomedan empires of Central Asia, in 1221, approached the Indus. In 1240, they made an incursion into India, and plundered the country as far as Lahore, retreating to Ghuzni. In this inroad, they were assisted by the Ghikers, or Gakkars. A few years later, the Monguls, having subjected the countries west of the Indus, attempted the conquest of India. The Punjab, however, was successfully defended. Bulbun, the vizir of Sultan Nasir-ud-deen, formed these frontier provinces into one great government, at the head of which he placed his relative, Sher Khan, as viceroy, who not only kept the Monguls out of the Punjab, but invaded their territory, and took Ghuzni. Repeated efforts were made by these Tartars upon the country in the reigns of Sultan Bulbun (or Balin) and his successors; but they were repelled.* In 1302, the Mongul sovereign of Transoxiana invaded the Punjab with 100,000 men, and a battle was fought in the neighbourhood of Lahore, in which the invaders were defeated by the forces of Alla-ud-deen, and compelled to retreat. The vice-royalty of Lahore seems, at this period, to have been a post of great power, and Ghazi-ben-Toghluk (whose mother was a Jat), who held it in 1321, marched to Delhi, subverted the Khilji dynasty of India, and seized upon the throne. In the subsequent reign of his son, Mahomed (who extended the Mahomedan empire in India to its widest limits), an army of Monguls having entered the country of the Five Rivers, the sultan bought them off by an immense contribution, the first instance in India of this delusive and dangerous policy. The extravagant projects of this prince threw his empire into confusion, and prepared its dismemberment; the governors of the provinces, beginning with that of Multan, rebelled; in 1339, the Afghans crossed the Indus, and ravaged the Punjab; when they retired, they were succeeded by the fierce Gakkars, under a leader, who took Lahore, and completed the ruin of the province.

Whilst the Mahomedan empire of India was thus rent asunder, and almost in a state of dissolution, its great provinces having become independent kingdoms, another mighty conqueror was preparing to lead his victorious bands across the Indus. Timur (or Tamerlane), having conquered Persia, Transoxiana, and Mesopotamia, turned his arms, without the pretext of a quarrel, upon the distracted empire of Hindustan. In August, 1397, he proceeded from Cabul to Dinkot (supposed to be Attock), crossed the Indus on a bridge of rafts, marched to the Jelum, and down its banks to Toolumba, reducing the country, levying contributions, and massacring the inhabitants. On the Ghara he was joined by his son, Pir Mahomed, who had taken Multan the preceding year, and marking his progress with fire and sword, he advanced to Delhi. The disorganized state of the provinces, and the weakness of the sovereign, permitted no effectual resistance to be offered to Timur, who was proclaimed emperor of India. Three months after, he quitted the country, marching from Hurdwar, on the Ganges, along the foot of the mountains, to Jummoo, north of Lahore; then, turning to the south, he fell into the route by which he had advanced.

After the departure of the Tartars, the empire became a prey to anarchy. The governors of provinces, or subahdars, renounced their dependence, and assumed royal titles. Lahore, the Punjab, and Multan, were seized by Khizr Khan, a Syud, who had been governor of Multan, but was expelled during the confusion that preceded the invasion of Timur. Khizr appealed to that conqueror, who gave him the government of the whole Punjab. Having now declared his independence, he, on the death of Shah Mahmud, in 1414, seized upon the throne of Delhi, affecting to recognize Timur as emperor of India, and to govern as his deputy. The Punjab became thus reunited to the empire ; but before long, the eastern portion, under Bheilol Khan Lodi, an Afghan, the governor of Sirhind, who made himself master of Lahore, and of the greater part of the Punjab, revolted, whilst the Gakkars continued to molest the whole country of the Five Rivers. Under Mobarik, the son and successor of Khizr, there was a constant struggle in the Punjab to reduce the eastern part to obedience, and to prevent the Gakkars from gaining possession of the other portion. Mahomed, Mobarik's successor, employed Bheilol, the king of Lahore, to expel the Gakkars, under Jisserit, from the northern part of the Punjab ; but the king craftily made his own terms with the Gakkars, and his territory is stated by Ferishta to have included the whole of the Punjab, Debalpur, Sirhind, and as far as Paniput. In 1450, he obtained possession of Delhi, and, on the abdication of Ala-ud-Deen, assumed the sovereignty, founding the dynasty of Lodi.

The accession of Bheilol to the imperial throne re-annexed the Punjab to the empire (though Multan still preserved its independence), and that great province was placed under a viceroy, Ali Khan, an Afghan, whose successor, Doulut Khan, in the reign of Ibrahim Lodi, revolted. As the history of this personage is connected with that of the founder of the Sikh sect, it may be proper to give a less brief notice of his career than can be permitted in this summary of the political history of other chiefs who, in these troubled times, rose and fell in the Punjab country.

Doulut Khan Lodi was of an Afghan or a Patan family, related to the imperial house of Delhi. His father, Tatar Khan, was rewarded with the possession of Sirhind and all the country north of the Sutluj, yielding a revenue (according to the emperor Baber) of upwards of three crores, which Mr. Erskine estimates at 150,000*l*. The Punjab westward of the Chenab was at this time governed by Syud

Ali Khan, in the name of Bheilol; but he resigned the governorship to Doulut Khan, then Hakim or Soubahdar of Lahore, who placed his eldest son, Ali Khan, over Behreh, situated apparently in the Sind-sagur doab. When Ibrahim Lodi began by his arrogance and cruelty to excite distrust and disaffection amongst the Afghan chiefs of India, whose ancestors had placed his family on the throne, Doulut Khan, dreading the fate of many who had been assassinated or imprisoned, revolted, and determined to call in the aid of the celebrated Baber, the accomplished king of Ferghana, who had previously invaded the Punjab,* which he claimed as part of his inheritance from Timur, his ancestor. He tells us, in his Memoirs, that "he regarded the Punjab as his own domain, and had been determined to obtain possession of it, either in peace or by war."

In 1519, being intent upon the conquest of India, Baber had crossed the Indus at Attock, the infantry being floated over on rafts, levied contributions in Behreh, and, appointing a governor of the country he had subjected, returned to Cabul. Prior to this incursion, he had endeavoured to open a communication with Doulut Khan; but Baber's envoy was not allowed to see him, and was detained some months at Lahore. "The Afghans of India," says the emperor in his Memoirs, "are a foolish and senseless race; they can neither remain in a state of amity; nor manfully persevere in war." In 1524, at the express invitation of Doulut Khan, he again crossed the Indus, marched through the country of the Gakkars, whom he subjected, and entered the territory of Lahore. Doulut Khan, however, had been meanwhile expelled by some Afghan chiefs in this quarter, who opposed Baber in the vicinity of the city of Lahore; but they were totally defeated; the city was sacked and reduced to ashes by the victors: Debalpur was taken by assault, and the garrison put to the sword. Baber was now joined by Doulut Khan, who, finding that the king was intent upon his own views, endeavoured to betray him. Baber discovered his treachery, and threw him and his son Ghazi Khan into prison; but soon after he released them, and bestowed Sultanpur and its dependencies upon Doulut Khan. He, however, again revolted and fled to the eastern hills, and his possessions were given by Baber to Dilawur Khan, one of Doulut's sons, who had remained faithful to him. Upon Baber's return to Cabul, Doulut Khan overran the Punjab; but in 1525, Baber recrossed the Indus, and on the left bank of the Beas, blockaded Doulut Khan in the fort of Milwat. "He proposed to surrender the place," the king says in his Memoirs, "if I would forgive his offences. To expose his rudeness, I required that he should come out with the same two swords about his neck which he had hung by his side to meet me in battle. After making some frivolous pretexts for delay, he was at length brought to me, and I ordered the two swords to be taken from his neck. When he came into the presence he seemed reluctant to bow, and I directed the men to push his leg and make him bow. Then he was placed by my side, and I thus addressed him: 'I called you Father; I shewed you more reverence than you expected. I delivered you and your sons from the insolence of the Baluches. I rescued your tribe, your family, and women from subjection to Ibrahim. I bestowed upon you the countries held by Tatar Khan, your father, to the amount of three crores of revenue (150,000*l.*). What evil have I ever done, that you should come in this style against me, with two swords ?” He was stupified, and stammered out a few words quite beside the purpose. It was settled that he and his family should retain their authority only over their own tribe, and give up all their property except their villages. Doulut Khan soon after died at Sultanpur.”

After the surrender of the fort, Baber marched to Roopur, on the Sutluj, and from thence direct upon Delhi, of which, as well as Agra, he took possession in 1526, and was “the founder of a line of kings under whom India rose to the highest pitch of prosperity, and out of the ruins of whose empire all the existing states in that country are composed.”*

CHAPTER IV.

RISE OF THE SIKH SECT.

WHILST the Punjab was, during the sixteenth century, a scene of endless contentions for power amongst foreign races, a religious sect, humble in its origin, unpretending in its primitive character, silently arose amidst the tumult of arms, and in spite of persecution, laid the foundations of a great state, which might have exerted a permanent influence upon the political destinies of India.

Nanuk, a Hindu of the Cshatriya caste and Vidi tribe, was born A. D. 1469, at the small village of Talwandi (since become a town, and now called Rayapur), on the banks of the Beas, in the district of Bhatti and province of Lahore. His father, whose name was Calu, had one son, Nanuk, and one daughter, Nanaci, who married a Hindu named Jayram, employed as a grain-factor by Doulut Khan Lodi, afterwards governor of the Punjab.

Nanuk is represented to have been from his childhood inclined to devotion, and indifferent to worldly concerns. His father endeavoured to divert his mind from this religious tendency, and amongst other expedients, gave him money to purchase salt at one village to sell it at another, for profit. Nanuk undertook the commission, and accompanied by a servant, named Bala, of the tribe of Sandhu, proceeded towards the village where he was to buy the salt. On the road he fell in with some Fakirs (holy mendicants), who were suffering from want of food, which they had not tasted for three days. Nanuk, affected by their condition, observed to Bala, "The gain of this world is transient; I wish to relieve these poor men, and thus obtain that gain which is eternal." His companion (who became afterwards the favourite disciple of Nanuk) commended his proposal, and the money given to purchase the salt was distributed by Nanuk amongst the starving Fakirs, who, when refreshed, entered into a long discourse upon the unity of God, with which the young Hindu was much delighted.

Upon his return home, his father inquired what profit he had made. "I have fed the poor," replied Nanuk, "and have thereby secured for you a gain that will endure for ever." Calu, provoked at this thoughtless prodigality, abused Nanuk, and even struck him. Ray Bolar, the ruler of the district, overheard this transaction, and, severely reproving Calu for his treatment of his son, interdicted him from ever lifting his hand against Nanuk, before whom, to the astonishment of all present, he humbled himself with profound veneration. This conduct on the part of Ray Bolar was the result of a remarkable occurrence related by Sikh writers.

When Nanuk was a youth, and employed to tend cattle in the fields, he fell asleep under a tree; but as the sun declined, its rays fell upon his face, whereupon a large black snake raised itself from the ground, and interposed its extended hood to protect Nanuk from the sun. Ray Bolar happened to pass the spot, and witnessed this unequivocal sign, as he believed, of Nanuk's sanctity and future eminence.

Calu, though obliged to treat his son with more forbearance, still hoped to detach him from his unprofitable abstractions, and in order to plunge him in worldly occupations, prevailed upon Jayram to admit his brother-in-law into partnership with him. Nanuk accordingly attended the granary of Doulut Khan, at Sultanpur; but though employed in business, his thoughts were ever engaged in devotional subjects, and fixed upon the Deity. One morning, whilst he sat in a contemplative posture, a Mahomedan Fakir approached him and exclaimed, "Oh Nanuk, quit these occupations and obtain eternal wealth." Starting up, after a pause, he distributed the contents of the granary amongst the poor, renounced all worldly occupations, and remained for three days in a pool of water, in a kind of trance, during which he is supposed to have had communication with the Prophet Khiz, as the Mahomedans call Elias.

Doulut Khan, hearing that his granary had been emptied, ordered Jāyram to be cast into prison for theft; but Nanuk, when he heard of this event, proceeded to the Khan, avowed the act, and offered to be responsible for all that was deficient in the granary. Jayram's accounts were accordingly examined, when a balance was found in his favour.

From this period, Nanuk began to practise the austerities of a holy man, and by his abstractions in the contemplation of the Divine Being, his abstinence and virtue, he acquired great celebrity. He is said to have travelled into various countries,—to the different places of Hindu pilgrimage, and to Mecca,—in order to reform the worship of the true God, which he perceived was degraded by the idolatry of the Hindus and the ignorance of the Mahomedans. He was accompanied in his travels by Bala Sandhu, his disciple, from whom tradition has preserved various narratives of extravagant or miraculous occurrences. Wherever he journeyed, he preached and explained to all ranks the doctrines of the unity and omnipresence of God, defending his own opinions without offending those of others; always professing himself an enemy of discord, whose sole object was to reconcile the two faiths of the Hindus and Mahomedans, by recalling them to that great original truth, the basis of both their creeds, the unity of God.

During his travels, in the year 1526, Nanuk was introduced to the Emperor Baber, before whom he maintained his doctrine with firmness and eloquence. Baber is said to have been pleased with the interview, and to have offered him an ample maintenance, which Nanuk refused, observing, that he trusted for support to Him who provided for all, and from whom alone a man of religion and virtue should accept favour or reward.

When Nanuk returned from his travels he cast off the garments of a Fakir, but he continued to give instructions to his now numerous disciples. He appears at this time to have experienced violent opposition from the Hindu zealots, who charged his doctrine with impiety, and when he visited Vatala, the Yogiswaras (recluses, who, by means of corporeal mortifications, are supposed to acquire a command over the powers of nature) were so enraged, that they strove, though vainly, to terrify him by their feats in enchantment, assuming (says one author) the shapes of tigers and serpents. When Nanuk was asked to exhibit some proof of his supernatural powers, he replied : “ A holy teacher has no defence but the purity of his doctrine ; the world may change, but the Creator is unchangeable.”

Nanuk is said to have proceeded to Multan, where he communed with the Pirs, or Mahomedan saints, of that country. Thence he went to Kirtipur, on the Ravi, where he died,* and was buried near the bank of the river, which has since overflowed his tomb. Kirtipur continues to be a place of religious resort to his followers, and a small piece of Nanuk's garment is exhibited to pilgrims, as a sacred relic, at his dharmsala, or temple.

Nanuk is generally termed by Mahomedan historians, Nanuk Shah, to denote his having been a Fakir. The Sikhs call him Baba Nanuk, ‘ Father Nanuk,’ or Guru Nanuk, ‘ Nanuk the Teacher ;’ and their writers term him, Nanuk Nirikar, which means,

‘Nanuk the Omnipresent.’ His character is fairly drawn by Sir John Malcolm: “The great eminence he attained, and the success with which he combated the opposition he met with, afford ample reason to conclude that he was a man of more than common genius; and this favourable impression of his character will be confirmed by a consideration of the object of his life, and the means he took to accomplish it. Born in a province on the extreme verge of India, at the very point where the religion of Muhammed and the idolatrous worship of the Hindus appeared to touch, and at a moment when both these tribes cherished the most violent rancour and animosity towards each other, his great aim was to blend these jarring elements in peaceful union, and he only endeavoured to effect his purpose through the means of mild persuasion. His wish was to recal both Muhammedans and Hindus to an exclusive attention to that sublimest of all principles, which inculcates devotion to God and peace towards man. He had to combat the furious bigotry of the one, and the deep-rooted superstition of the other; but he attempted to overcome all obstacles by the force of reason and humanity; and we cannot have a more convincing proof of the general character of that doctrine which he taught, and the inoffensive light in which it was viewed, than the knowledge that its success did not rouse the bigotry of the intolerant and tyrannical Muhammedan government under which he lived.”*

Nanuk was indebted for his religious notions to the doctrines of the Kabir Pantis, or followers of Kabir,† one of the twelve disciples of the Hindu schismatic, Ramanand. Kabir assailed the whole system of idolatrous worship, ridiculed the learning of the pundits and doctrines of the Sastras, in a style peculiarly suited to the genius of his countrymen, whilst he also directed his compositions to the Musulman, as well as to the Hindu faith, and with equal severity attacked the mullah and the Koran. The effect of his lessons, indirectly as well as directly, has been great, and Mr. Wilson has shewn, that several of the popular sects in India are little more than ramifications from his stock. The Kabir Pantis admit of but one God, the creator of the world;* and Nanuk taught that devotion was due but to one God; that forms were immaterial, and like the Bramin (probably a disciple of Kabir) who maintained before Secander Lodi, that all religions, if sincerely practised, were equally acceptable to God,—for which he was put to death by that prince,—he held that Hindu and Mahomedan modes of worship were the same in the sight of the Deity.

The followers of Nanuk had now augmented in numbers (amounting, it is said, to 100,000) and become a distinct sect. Their present denomination is derived from the Sanscrit word sicsha, which is a general term, meaning a disciple, or devoted follower, and has been corrupted in the Punjabi dialect into Sikh. He was married at an early age, and had two sons, named Srichand and Lacshmi Das. The former, who abandoned the world, had a son named Dherm Chand, who founded the sect of Udasi, and his descendants are still known as Nanukputra, 'children of Nanuk.' Lacshmi Das plunged into worldly pleasures, and left neither heirs nor reputation. Nanuk did not deem either of his sons worthy to succeed to his spiritual office, which he bequeathed to a Cshatriya, of the Trehun tribe, named Lehana (born at Khandur, on the bank of the Beas, forty miles east of Lahore), whom he had initiated in the sacred mysteries of his sect, clothed in the holy mantle of a Fakir, and endowed with the name or title of Angad.

The life of Guru Angad was not distinguished by any remarkable action. He taught the same doctrine as Nanuk, and wrote some chapters of the Sikh scriptures now called Grant'h, the first part of which includes the Pran Sankali, composed by Nanuk himself for the instruction of his followers. Angad had two sons, who were not initiated, and at his death, in 1552, he was succeeded by Amera Das, a Cshatriya of the Bhale tribe, who had performed the office of a menial to Angad for twelve years, fetching water daily from the Beas, six miles off, to wash his master's feet.

Amera Das was distinguished by his activity in preaching the tenets of Nanuk, and he made many converts, by the aid of whom he established some temporal power, and built Kujarawal. A separation now took place between the followers of Amera Das and the Udasis, the sect of Dherm Chand. Amera Das had a son, Mohan, and a daughter, Mohani, or Bhaini; he was very anxious regarding the marriage of the latter, and employed a Bramin to seek a fit husband for her; but Amera's attention having been accidentally drawn to a youth named Ram Das, a Cshatriya of a respectable family of the Sondi tribe, he gave him his daughter in marriage. Amera Das died in 1574, and was succeeded by this son-in-law, whom he had initiated in the sacred mysteries of the sect.

Ram Das became celebrated for his piety, and for the improvements he made at Amritsur, an ancient city, then called Chak, which for some time had the name of Ram-pur, or Ramdaspur,* after him. He built a tank of water, which he termed Amritsur, signifying 'water of immortality;' this tank has acquired a sacred character, and has imparted its holiness to the city.

Ram Das passed a quiet life, employing it chiefly in the composition of works explanatory of the Sikh tenets, and died at Amritsur in 1581, leaving two sons, Arjunmal and Bharatmal, the former of whom succeeded him, and has rendered himself illustrious by compiling the Adi Granth, or First Sacred Volume of the Sikhs.† This work originally received its present form and arrangement from Arjun, who enlarged and improved, by additions of his own, the most valuable writings of Nanuk and his immediate successors, Angad, Amara Das and Ram Das.‡ Arjun, therefore, is to be deemed the first who gave a consistent form to the religion of the Sikhs, which, though it united the sect and increased its numbers, provoked the jealousy of the Mahomedans, to which Arjun fell a sacrifice. "The spirit of the Sikh religion," observes Mr. Elphinstone,* "promised to keep its votaries at peace with all mankind; but such views of comprehensive charity were particularly odious to the bigoted part of the Mahomedans." In order to trace the causes of the persecution of the new sect, it is necessary to take a glance at the state of the Punjab subsequent to the invasion of Baber.

That conqueror left his son Humayun in possession of the throne of Delhi, which he was soon called to defend against his own family. Kamran, Baber's second son, who had the government of Cabul and Candahar, determined to seize upon the Punjab, and Humayun thought it prudent to yield with a good grace what he would have found it difficult to retain by force, and conferred upon his brother the government of the country of the Five Rivers, as far as the Indus, and northward from that river to Persia, on condition that he held this territory as a dependency. Humayun was a few years later attacked and defeated by Sher Khan, the governor of Bahar, and fled to his brother Kamran, at Lahore; but this prince was glad to make peace with the victor, by ceding to him the Punjab, retiring to his government of Cabul. The Doabs were for some time a place of refuge for Humayun, who appears to have experienced much suffering, and his son, the illustrious Akbar, was born during this period, in the fortress of Amerkot, October 14th, 1542. The emperor was eventually compelled to retire to Candahar, and afterwards to Persia, leaving Sher Shah in possession of the throne of India, whose sons contended for the empire, the Punjab being the scene of the conflict. The Sur family continued long in a state of mutual hostilities, and in 1554, Secander Sur, nephew of Sher Shah, proclaimed himself king in the Punjab. In the midst of these rebellions, Humayun re-crossed the Indus from Cabul; the governors in the Punjab fled before him: he continued his progress towards the Sut-luj, occupied Lahore, and recovered his throne, with a small portion, however, of his former dominions.* His son, the celebrated Akbar, was employed to reduce the Punjab, which, with much difficulty, he wrested from Secander Sur. Upon the death of his father, in 1555, Akbar's territory as Shah was confined to the Punjab and the country around Delhi and Agra. The provinces within the Five Rivers were soon the theatre of a fierce contest, brought on by the attempt of prince Hakim to wrest it from his brother, in which he failed, and was driven across the Indus, upon which occasion Akbar built the fort of Attock. The Punjab was now securely annexed to the imperial territory, and the prince made that country his residence for fourteen years, usually dwelling at Lahore.

The reign of Akbar was favourable to the progress of the new sect. His religious opinions were of the most liberal kind. His own creed was a pure deism. He maintained that we ought to reverence God according to the knowledge of him derived from our own reason, by which his unity and benevolence are sufficiently established. "He seems," says Mr. Elphinstone,* "to have been by nature devout, and to have inclined even to superstitions that promised him a closer connection with the Deity than was afforded by the religion which his reason approved." The views of Akbar approximate to those of the Kabir Pantis.

The accession of Jehangir restored the forms and tenets of the Mahomedan faith, which had been discouraged by his father, and with them the spirit of persecution. In the year 1606, a Hindu zealot, named Dani-chand, whose writings Arjunmal had refused to admit into the Adi-Grant'h, because the notions they inculcated were irreconcilable with the pure doctrine of the unity and omnipotence of God, had sufficient influence with the Mahomedan governor of the province, to procure the imprisonment of Arjun, who is said to have been put to death in a cruel manner. The martyrdom of their pontiff converted the Sikhs, hitherto an inoffensive sect of quietists, into a band of fanatical warriors; they took arms under Har Govind, the son of Arjunmal, and wreaked their vengeance upon all whom they believed to have been concerned in the atrocious deed.

At this moment, Prince Khosru, the emperor's eldest son, had raised the standard of revolt against his father, in that part of the Punjab where the Sikhs were located, chiefly in the neighbourhood of Lahore. The contest carried on by Har Govind against the Mahomedans seems to have led to no event of sufficient importance to be noticed by cotemporary writers; but it appears to have been his desire to imbue his party with an irreconcilable hatred, and a desperate spirit of hostility, towards the Mahomedans. It is stated, that he wore two swords in his girdle, and when asked the reason, replied, "One is to revenge the death of my father; the other to destroy the miracles of Mahomed."

interdicted swine's flesh, to flatter the Mahomedans. Har Govind had five sons, Babu Gurudaitya, Saurat Singh, Tegh Bahadur, Anna Ray, and Atal Ray. The second and third were forced, by the persecutions of the Mahomedans, to fly into the mountains north of the Punjab. The eldest died early, leaving two sons, Daharmal, and Har Ray, the latter of whom succeeded Har Govind, who died in 1644. His rule was tranquil; but upon his death, in 1661, a violent contest arose amongst the Sikhs, regarding the succession to the office of their spiritual leader, and the question was referred to the arbitration of the emperor, who, by an imperial decree, allowed the Sikhs to elect their own priest. They chose Har Crishin, who died in 1664, and was succeeded by his uncle, Tegh Bahadur. He had, however, to encounter a most violent opposition from his nephew, Ram Ray, who remained at Delhi, and endeavoured, by art and intrigue, to effect his ruin. Tegh Bahadur was cast into prison, afterwards released, and took up his abode at Patna, where a Sikh college was founded; but in the end he fell a sacrifice to his nephew's rancour, or, as some say, to his own depredations in the Punjab, and he was publicly executed in 1675.

From the time of Har Govind, the Sikhs had made no progress, and their records are unsatisfactory. They seem to have suffered in their first attempt to attain political power, by the vigorous rule of the Mogul government, then, under Aurungzeb, in the zenith of its strength, and by their own dissensions. After the death of Tegh Bahadur, their history assumes a new aspect. It is no longer the record of sectaries desirous of protecting themselves, not of injuring others, but that of a nation, actuated by a deep sense of the injuries they had received from a bigoted and tyrannical government, who listened, with all the ardour of men commencing a career of military glory, to the call of a son, glowing with a desire of vengeance against the murderers of his father, and inviting them to lay aside their peaceful habits, and engraft the courage of the soldier upon the enthusiasm of the devotee.

rished a sentiment of implacable resentment against those who had caused it. Being acknowledged by the Sikhs as their Sat-guru, or spiritual leader, he first conceived the idea of forming the Sikhs into a religious and military commonwealth, and "executed his design," as Mr. Elphinstone observes, "with the systematic spirit of a Grecian lawgiver." He succeeded in effecting a complete change in their habits, character, and creed. Hitherto they had resorted to arms only in self-defence, which is sanctioned by the institutions of the Hindus; but Guru Govind broke through a rule which limited his own ambition as well as the growth of the sect; he perceived that the only effectual means of resisting the Mahomedan government were to admit converts from all tribes, to arm the whole population, and to make worldly wealth and eminence objects to which Hindus of every rank might aspire. The latent aim of Nanuk was to abolish the distinctions of caste amongst the Hindus; and Guru Govind, who resolved to make this equality a fundamental principle of the sect, is reported to have said that the four castes of Hindus would, like pan (betel leaf), chunam (lime), supari (areca-nut), and khat (catechu),—the constituents of the masticatory given customarily to visitors—become of one colour when well chewed. It was his policy, therefore, to place all who subscribed to the Sikh doctrine, as far as possible, upon a level, whether Bramin or Sudra, and to make their advancement solely dependent upon their own exertions. He admitted all nations and all creeds, Mahomedans and Hindus; and well aware how essential it was that men of low birth, nursed in the slavish notions of submission and subserviency, should be taught a sentiment of self-respect, he gave to all his followers the honourable epithet of Singh, or ‘lion,’ hitherto confined to the proud Rajpoots, belonging to the high military caste of Hindus, with whom every Sikh now felt himself on a footing of equality. His followers, to whom he gave the name of Khalsa Singh, were required to dedicate themselves, from birth or initiation, to arms; always to have steel about them; to wear a blue dress; to allow their hair to grow; to salute each other with the phrases “Wah! Guruji ka Khalsa!"* or "Wah! Guruji ki Fateh!" which means, 'success to the state of the Guru!' and 'victory attend the Guru!' These exclamations became, as they were intended to be, watchwords, which kept alive in the minds of the Sikhs their religious faith and the civil obligations they owed to their leader. The rules with respect to dress and appearance (for which various reasons are assigned by Sikh writers) were evidently designed to distinguish this sect from all other classes in India, and give them a kind of national character. The blue garb is still worn by the Akalis, or devotees of the sect.

Guru Govind propagated and enforced his tenets by preaching, by acts, and by writing. The Dasama Padshah ka Grant'h, or 'Book of the Tenth King,'—Guru Govind being the tenth leader from Nanuk,—is his work, which is not limited to religious subjects, but includes narratives, written in a glowing and even hyperbolical style, of his battles.

* Khalsa, 'select,' is a term equivalent to 'commonwealth,' or 'state;' but is supposed by the Sikhs to have a mystical meaning, and to imply the theocracy under which they live.

composed with a view of infusing a spirit of valour and emulation into his followers. It is as much revered amongst the Sikhs as the Adi-Granth. He instituted the Guru Mata, or State Council, which met at Amritsur, and by admitting the Sikhs to a personal share in the government, gave to their political institutions the form of a federative republic. The history of Govind, therefore, is intimately interwoven with that of the Sikh sect.

He was born at Patna, and brought up at Madradesa, in the Punjab. After his father's death, he addicted himself to hunting and other manly exercises; but he gave offence to the Emperor of Delhi, who ordered the Mahomedan governors to attack him. In the first action, according to his own evidence, the arrows of the Sikhs triumphed over the sabres of the Mahomedans, "through the favour of the Most High," and two principal chiefs of the imperial army, Hyat Khan and Nejabet Khan, fell.

His first success greatly increased the number of his followers, who were established at Anandpur, Khilore, and other towns. He next leagued with Bhima Chand, the Raja of Nadon (a mountainous tract bordering on the Punjab), who was threatened with invasion by the Raja of Jummoo and Mia Khan, a Mogul chief. Bhima Chand and his Sikh allies were completely successful, and drove the Raja of Jummoo and the Mahomedans across the Sutluj. Govind was next engaged with Dilawer Khan, Viceroy of the Punjab, whose son attempted to surprise the Sikhs, but his troops were seized with a panic and fled. In a subsequent general action (in which Govind was not present) the Sikhs routed the army of Hosain Khan (one of the commanders of Dilawer Khan), who was killed. Upon this, the viceroy marched in person against the Sikhs, who had become disheartened at the loss of some of their forts and the death of several of their leaders, and especially at the accounts they received of the rage of the Emperor Aurungzeb, who, in 1701, detached his son, Bahadur Shah, to settle the disturbances in the Punjab. Govind acknowledges that, on the approach of the prince, his own followers were struck with terror; many deserted him and fled to the mountains. Upon this occasion, he promises in his work prosperity here and eternal blessings hereafter to those who adhere to their Guru, imprecating all the miseries of this world and the torments of the next upon those who desert him. "The man who does this," he says, "shall have no offspring; his parents shall die in grief and sorrow; he shall perish like a dog, and be cast into hell."* He concludes by expatiating upon the shame that attends apostasy, and the rewards that await those who remain true to their religion.

The numbers of the Sikhs, however, were yet too small to accomplish the plans of their leader. An imperial army, joined by the rajas of Kahilar (or Khalore), Jiswal, and others, who had been defeated and disgraced by Govind, marched into the Punjab to punish the Sikhs, who were compelled to shut themselves up in their fortresses, where they were besieged, and they endured all the miseries of sickness and famine. Govind, after suffering great hardships, determined to attempt his escape. He ordered his followers to leave the fort one by one, at midnight, and disperse; he quitted it amongst the rest, and reached Chamkour, the raja of which place was his friend. The enemy entered the fort the moment he had left it, and finding there Govind's mother and two children, with others who could not be removed, they were carried to Foujdar Khan, the governor of Sirhind, by whose orders, or those of Vizir Khan, they were inhumanly massacred. The imperial army, aided by the rajas hostile to Govind, marched to Chamkour and besieged it. The Guru, in despair, clasping his hands, invoked Bhavani Durga, the sanguinary goddess of the sword,* and prepared, with his few followers, to make a desperate effort.

* There is a passage in this chapter of the work which seems to imply an acknowledgment of the emperor's temporal supremacy; that the Guru was the king of the religion of the Sikhs, and the emperor the "Lord of the World."

The imperial army was commanded by

* The sword is an object of veneration or worship amongst the Govind Sikhs, as it was amongst the Getae, the Scythian ancestors of the Jats, from whom the Sikhs are descended.

Khawajeh Mahomed and Nahar Khan, who sent a message to the Sikh leader, to the effect that the forces were not those of rival rajas, but belonged to the great Aurungzeb: "Shew, therefore, your respect," they said, "and embrace the true faith." The envoy added, as from himself, in friendly advice:—"Leave off contending with us, and playing the infidel; you can never succeed in such an unequal war." Ajeet Singh, the son of Govind, drawing his scimitar, exclaimed,— "Utter another word, and I will smite your head from your body and cut you to pieces, for daring so to address our chief." The envoy, boiling with rage, returned with this defiance to the imperial camp.

The siege commenced with vigour; the Sikhs, especially Ajeet Singh and Runjeet Singh, the sons of Govind, exhibited acts of prodigious valour. The former fell; and although Govind himself shewed an invincible spirit, and killed with his own hand one of the Mahomedan commanders (Nahar Khan), and wounded the other, he found it impossible to contend with such superior numbers, and in a dark night fled from Chamkour, "covering his face for shame at his own disgrace." At Chamkour, as well as at the other forts where Sikhs were taken, they had their noses and ears cut off.

A sense of his own misfortunes, the loss of his children, his humiliation, the sufferings of his followers, and the threatened ruin of the sect, according to most accounts, robbed Govind of his reason, and he became a fugitive and a lunatic, so that the rest of his history is not correctly known. One writer states that he died in the Punjab; another, at Patna; a third, that his military talents recommended him to Bahadur Shah, who gave him a small military command in the Deccan, where he was stabbed by a Patan, and expired of the wound at Naded (or Nander), a small town on the Cavery river, in 1708.

"In the character of this reformer of the Sikhs," observes Sir John Malcolm, "it is impossible not to recognize many of those features which have distinguished the most celebrated founders of political communities. The object he attempted was great and laudable. It was the emancipation of his tribe from oppression and persecution; and the means which he adopted were such as a comprehensive mind could alone have suggested. The Muhammedan conquerors of India, as they added to their territories, added to their strength, by making proselytes through the double means of persuasion and force; and these, the moment they had adopted their faith, became the supporters of their power against the efforts of the Hindus, who, bound in the chains of their civil and religious institutions, could neither add to their number by admitting converts, nor allow more than a small proportion of the population of the country to arm against the enemy. Govind saw that he could only hope for success by a bold departure from usages which were calculated to keep those, by whom they were observed, in a degraded subjection to an insulting and intolerant race. ‘You make Hindus Muhammedans, and are justified by your laws,’ he is said to have written^o to Aurungzeb; ‘now I, on a principle of self-preservation, which is superior to all laws, will make Muhammedans Hindus.* You may rest,' he added, 'in fancied security; but, beware! for I will teach the sparrow to strike the eagle to the ground:' a fine allusion to his design of inspiring the lowest races among the Hindus with that valour and ambition which would lead them to perform the greatest actions."

Guru Govind appears to have had in view not merely the separation of the Sikhs from the Hindus, but the overthrow of a system of civil policy, which, being interwoven with the religion of a submissive race, made them slaves to their priesthood, and though calculated to retain a community in obedience to its rulers, made them an easy conquest to any powerful foreign invader.

Guru Govind was the last acknowledged ruler of the Sikhs; a prophecy had limited their spiritual guides to the number of ten, and their superstition, aided no doubt by the action of that spirit of independence which his institutions had introduced, caused its fulfilment.

* "Meaning Sikha, whose faith, though it differs widely from the present worship of the Hindus, has been thought to have considerable analogy to the pure and simple religion, originally followed by that nation."

Happily for the Sikhs, the persecutions of the Mahomedans were suspended by the distractions of the empire, and only exalted their fanaticism, and inspired a gloomy spirit of vengeance, which broke out under Banda (or Bandu), a bairagi (or religious ascetic), the friend and a devoted follower of Guru Govind, a man of daring character and sanguinary disposition, who established their union under his banners; and the Sikhs gradually assumed the character and rank of a military nation.*

CHAPTER V.

THE RELIGION, GOVERNMENT, AND INSTITUTIONS OF THE SIKHS.

THE religion of the Sikhs, or Nanuk-Shahis, like that of the primitive Hindus, is based upon a pure deism, a belief in one God, the Creator of the Universe. The original sect of Nanuk has, however, branched into various sub-sects, which are not confined to the Punjab, but to be found in various parts of India.

It has been already mentioned that Nanuk had imbibed the tenets of the Kabir Pantis, and was apparently contemporary with the founder, who is claimed by both Mahomedans and Hindus, a fact indicative of the Catholic spirit of his doctrines. In one of Kabir's works occurs the following passage:—
 “Of what benefit is cleaning your mouth, counting your beads, performing ablution, and bowing yourself in temples, when, whilst

you mutter your prayers, or journey to Mecca and Medina, deceitfulness is in your heart? The Hindu fasts every eleventh day; the Musulman during the Ramazan. Who formed the remaining months and days, that you should venerate but one? If the Creator dwell in tabernacles, whose residence is the universe? Behold but one in all things; He, whose is the world, is my Guru (teacher), He is my Pir (saint)." The Kabir Pantis restrict their belief to one God; they assert that he has a body formed of the five elements of matter; but he is free from all defects of human nature, and can assume what particular shape he pleases, though in all other respects he does not differ from man. He is, however, eternal, without end or beginning, and the origin of all things, the elementary matter, of which he consists and of which all things and all beings are made, residing in him before they took their present form. They recognize the doctrine of transmigration, and apparently the never-dying nature of man, who is ultimately absorbed into the Divine essence. The Kabir Pantis regard heaven and hell, in the senses attached to the terms by Hindus and Mahomedans, as inventions of Maya, the principle of falsehood and delusion; considering hell to be only the torments of this world. The moral code of the Kabir Pantis is short, but of a favourable tendency. Humanity is a cardinal virtue, and the shedding of blood a heinous crime, since life is the gift of God, and must not be violated by his creatures. Truth is the other great principle of their code, since all the ills of the world, and ignorance of God, they attribute to original falsehood. Retirement from the world is desirable, because the passions and desires, the hopes and fears, which the social state engenders, are hostile to tranquillity and purity of spirit, and prevent that undisturbed meditation upon man and God which is necessary to their comprehension.*

The doctrine taught by Nanuk differed little from that of Kabir, and deviated inconsiderably from the pure principles of the Hindu faith in general. "The whole body of poetical and mythological fiction was retained, whilst the liberation of the spirit from the delusive deceits of Maya, and its purification by acts of benevolence and self-denial, so as to make it identical even in life with its Divine source, were the great objects of the devotee. Associated with these notions was great chariness of animal life, whilst, with Nanuk as with Kabir, universal tolerance was a dogma of vital importance, and both laboured to persuade Hindus and Mahomedans that the only essential parts of their respective creeds were common to both, and that they should discard the varieties of practical details, as the corruptions of their teachers, for the worship of one only Supreme, whether he was termed Allah or Hari."* Nanuk's object was to reform, not to destroy, the religion in which he was born, and he treats the Hindu creed, even its polytheism and its veneration for the cow, with respect, and he speaks of Mahomed and his successors with moderation; condemning, however, their endeavours to propagate their faith by the sword. "That prophet," he says, "was sent by God to do good, and to disseminate the knowledge of one God, through means of the Koran." He seems to have blended, with a belief in a future state of rewards and punishments, the Hindu doctrine of the metempsychosis. In all his writings he borrowed indiscriminately from the Koran and the Sastras.

The most acceptable offerings to God, according to Nanuk, are morning praise, and the presentation of the body to him; he promised the person who did this, the Divine favour and future absorption into the Deity. "He who serves God, the fountain of all good," says the Adi Grant'h, "will obtain his blessing. God is served by listening to his excellencies, by meditating upon them, and by celebrating their praise: the method of which is to be obtained from a spiritual guide, who is above all the gods, and in fact, God himself."* The following is one of the hymns sung by the Nanuk-Shahis:†

* Ward, View of the Hindus, vol. iii. p. 460.

† Wilson, ut ante.

Thou art the Lord—to thee be praise.
All life is with thee.
Thou art my parents; I am thy child.
All happiness is derived from thy clemency.
No one knows thy end.
Highest Lord amongst the highest—
Of all that exists, Thou art the Regulator,
And all that is from thee obeys thy will.
Thy movements, thy pleasure, thou only knowest.
Nanuk, thy slave, is a free-will offering unto thee.

Nanuk declared that “hearing the praises of God is followed by every degree of exaltation (subject to future births), even to the dignity of the gods. Meditation upon God is followed by unspeakable gain, even by absorption in God. The Deity has created innumerable worlds; the period of creation is known only to himself.” In reply to a question from a disciple, respecting the value of outward ceremonies, Nanuk, without altogether denying the value of ceremonies, recommended mental worship as of greater importance. “The knowledge of God,” he says, “is more than all ceremonies.” He objected to separate religious societies, and persuaded his followers to unite themselves to the whole human race. "The earth, and all worlds," he says, "are upheld by Religion, the mother of which is Compassion, who dwells with Contentment." He commands obedience to "the Being who is unchangeable and eternal, who dwells in truth." He compares the human body to a field, the mind to the husbandman, the praises of God to seed, and absorption into God to the fruit. Although Nanuk established his reputation for sanctity by the performance of severe ascetic penance,—living upon sand, and sleeping upon sharp pebbles,—Arjunmal declares that God is not compelled to grant blessings by any works of merit; devotion alone has this power over God.* His opinion, that the Deity is a pervading spirit, unconfined by space or locality,— is shewn by the remarkable answer Nanuk gave to a Mahomedan priest, who, when the former was lying on the ground, with his feet in the direction of Mecca, exclaimed, "How darest thou, infidel, turn thy feet towards the house of God?" "Turn then, if you can," replied Nanuk mildly, "where the house of God is not."

The pacific spirit of his doctrines is indicated by this injunction of Nanuk: "Put on armour that will harm no one; let thy coat of mail be that of understanding, and convert thy enemies to friends: fight with valour, but with no weapon but the word of God."*

Both Nanuk and Guru Govind expressly forbid all worship of images.

Sir John Malcolm says there is no ground to conclude that caste was altogether abolished by Nanuk; though his writings had a tendency to equalize the Hindus. In the Adi Grant'h, he declares that vice and bad qualities are the only distinctions between men; that a person of wicked principles, however high his birth and rank, is on a level with one of the lowest caste. "Such a man, though he surround himself with a fence, lest he should be defiled,"—alluding to the practice of high-caste Hindus, who sometimes draw a circle round them, when they eat, to escape accidental pollution,—“deceives himself; he in fact eats with a chandala. Speaking truth is the best purifier of the body; good works the best fence, and repeating the name of God, the best ablution: excellence of character is confined to him who preserves himself from evil.*

The Adi Granth is in verse; many of the chapters, written by Nanuk, are termed Pidi, which means literally a ladder or flight of steps, and metaphorically, that by which a man ascends. Translations from this work have been given by Sir John Malcolm, Mr. Ward, and Professor Wilson.

The Dasama Padshah ka Granth, written by Guru Govind, is considered as holy as the Adi Granth. The work, which is elegantly written in the Punjabi dialect, contains an account of the author's mission “to establish virtue, exalt piety, and exterminate the wicked.” It is less tolerant towards the Mahomedan tenets than the Adi Granth, and more favourable towards those of the Hindus, which is ascribed to Govind's education at Mathura.

The Sikhs, or Nanuk-Shahis, are classed under seven distinctions, all recognizing Nanuk as their primitive instructor, and all professing to follow his doctrines; but separated from each other by variations of practice, or by a distinct and peculiar teacher.

1. The Udasis may be regarded as the genuine disciples of Nanuk, professing (as the name denotes) indifference to worldly vicissitudes. They are purely religious characters; devoting themselves to prayer and meditation, and are usually collected in sangats, colleges or convents; they also travel about to places of pilgrimage, generally in parties of some strength. They profess poverty, although they never solicit alms; and although ascetics, they place no merit in wearing mean garments, or dispensing altogether with clothes; on the contrary, they are in general well dressed, and, allowing the whiskers and beard to grow, are not unfrequently of a venerable and imposing appearance. Though usually practising celibacy, it does not appear to be a necessary condition: they are usually the ministrant priests, but their office consists chiefly in reading and expounding the writings of Nanuk and Govind Singh, as collected in the Adi Granth and Das Padshah ki Granth. With that fondness for sensible objects of reverence which characterizes the natives of India, the book is also worshipped, and rupees, flowers, and fruits are presented by the votaries, which become, of course, the property of the officiating Udasi. In return, the Udasi not uncommonly adopts the presentation of the Prasada. Mr. Moorcroft says he had seldom met with persons of more simple, unaffected, and pious manners than the Udasis.

2. Ganj Bakshis.—Of this division, which is not numerous, little is known.

3. The Ramrayis.—These derive their appellation from that of Ram Ray (son or grandson of Har Ray), who disputed unsuccessfully the succession to the pontificate with Har Crishin, son of Har Ray. Their distinction from the other Sikhs is more of a political than a religious complexion.

4. The Suthreh Shahis are more common than the two preceding; they lead a vagabond life, begging and singing songs, mostly of a moral or mystical tendency. They are not unfrequently gamblers, drunkards, and thieves, and are held in great disrepute. They look up to Tegn Bahadur, the father of Guru Govind, as their founder.

5. The Govind Singhs.—These form the most important division of the Sikh community; being, in fact, the political association to which the name is applied, or to the Sikh nation generally. Although professing to derive their national faith from Nanuk, and holding his memory in veneration, the faith they follow is widely different from the quietism of that reformer, and is chiefly of a worldly and warlike spirit. Guru Govind devoted his followers to steel, and hence the worship of the sword, as well as its employment against both Mahomedans and Hindus. By his institutions he separated the Sikhs, in political constitution, as well as religious tenets, from the Hindus, though they still worship the deities of that people, and derive their legends from the same source. The Govind Singhs pay great veneration to Bramins, notwithstanding their avowed rejection of caste.

6. The Nirmalas differ but little from the Udasis, and are, perhaps, still closer adherents to the doctrines of the founder (as the name imports), professing to be free from all worldly stain, and leading a wholly religious life. They observe celibacy, and disregard their personal appearance, often going nearly naked. They are not, like the Udasis, assembled in colleges, nor do they hold any particular form of divine service, but confine their devotion to speculative meditation on, or perusal of, the writings of Nanuk, Kabir, and other Unitarian teachers. They are always solitary, supported by their disciples or opulent individuals, and are often known as able expounders of the Vedanta philosophy, in which the Brahmins do not disdain to become their scholars.

7. The Nagas, or naked mendicants, are not distinguishable from the Nirmalas, except in going without clothes.

The dharmsalas, or temples of the Sikhs, are in general plain buildings. They are built by rich men, or by several uniting to defray the expense. They have a flat roof, and are sufficiently capacious to accommodate a multitude of attendants, who sit or stand during worship. Images are banished. The bungas, or temples, at Amritsur, surrounding the Holy Tank, are fine buildings; each missul (or association of Sikhs) has a separate bunga. The forms of prayer and praise are simple. Portions of the Adi Gran'th are read or sung; the priest says, "Meditate upon the Book," and the people reply "Wah, Guru! Wah, Guru ki Fateh!" Guru Govind not only introduced the worship of Doorga and the sword, but, it is said, offered sacrifices at her festivals. In the Dasama Padshah ki Gran'th she is represented as the tutelary goddess of war.

Baron Hügel has furnished a description of the sacred temple of Hari Mander at Amritsur,* which he visited in 1836. The temple, he says, is particularly mysterious and romantic in its character. It is surmounted by a golden roof, very skilfully contrived, and is inlaid with marble, a large door of gold opening into the temple, which is surrounded with little vestibules, the ceilings being supported by richly ornamented pillars. Before the entrance to the bridge are two large banners of red: on one is written, houses. The tulao, or sacred tank, is about 150 paces square, and has a large body of water, which appears to be supplied by a natural artesian well; it is surrounded by a pavement twenty or twenty-five paces broad. Round this square are some of the most considerable houses of the city, and buildings belonging to the temple; the whole being inclosed by gates. The bathers descend by stone steps into the water, which is as clear as a mirror. In the midst of the tank stands the temple of Hari Mander, which is reached by a bridge. The holiest place of bathing is on the east side, opposite to which stand some small buildings, in which gurus and fakirs are seated. Another, untenanted, is shewn as the place where Ram Das passed his life. Several fanciful-looking structures are before the eastern entrance. "A lugubrious sound of music," says the Baron, "proceeded thence, and a guru, clad in silk, appeared seated under the canopy belonging to a throne on the first story, surrounded by a sort of court or levee. Every bather, on returning from ablution, brings a present to these gurus."

* The holy city of Amritsur is about midway between the Ravi and the Beas, and thirty-two miles from Lahore. Baron Hügel describes it as larger than Lahore, and the abode of the great merchants, and says the whole wealth of the Punjab seems collected in it. The streets are narrow, but the houses are tolerably lofty, built of burnt brick. The chief entrance to the temple is very unpretending, and inclosed by houses.

“ Wah ! Guruji ki Fateh !” in white letters ; on the other, the name of Ram Das. In the centre of the temple sat the first guru of the Sikh faith on a throne of cushions, with a carpet of Cashmere shawl stuff before him. A large circle of devotees and followers had formed around him, leaving an open space, which is never encroached upon. The guru kept his eyes fixed upon the Grant'h, or Holy Book.

Daily worship is performed by pious Sikhs, either in the dwelling-house, or in a place devoted to religious uses. Portions of the Scriptures are read every day by those who possess the books, and those who do not, repeat the names of Nanuk or Govind. The followers of these personages have become accustomed, in violation of their creed, to pay them divine honours, regarding the former especially (to whose tomb they make pilgrimages) as a saint and saviour.

The principal of the religious institutions of Guru Govind is that of Pahal, the ceremony by which a convert is initiated and made a member of the Sikh Khalsa, or commonwealth. The forms which Govind employed are still observed. The neophyte is told by the officiating Granthi, or priest, that he must allow his hair to grow. When it has grown a month or two, he dresses himself in blue from head to foot, and is then presented with five weapons, a sword, a firelock, a bow, an arrow, and a pike. The candidate and the initiator wash their feet with water, in which sugar is put, and this nectar (called pahal) is stirred with a steel knife or dagger; five quatrains from the Scriptures being read. Between each quatrain, the breath is exhaled with a puff, and the beverage stirred as before. The hands of the convert are then joined, and the Granthi, or initiator, pours some of the nectar into them, of which he drinks five times, rubbing a little on his head and beard, exclaiming “ Wah ! Guruji ka Khalsa ! Wah ! Guruji ki Fateh !” or, “ Wah ! Govind Singh, ap hi Guru chela !” ‘Hail Govind, preceptor and pupil.’* The disciple is then asked whether he consents to be of the faith, and if he answers that he does consent, the priest enjoins him to abandon all intercourse with five sects, which are named; to be gentle and courteous to all; to strive to attain wisdom; to consider the interests of the Khalsa or state as paramount to his own, and make every sacrifice in support of it and its members: whatever he has received from God he is told it is his duty to share with others. He is directed to read the Scriptures every morning and every evening, and, at present, the priest worships the sacred book and prepares a meat-offering. The priest then demands the name of the convert, and if it be insignificant, it is changed for another, the epithet singh is added, and he is declared duly initiated. The priest then teaches him an incantation, to which the Sikhs pay great reverence. Women are made Sikhs in the same manner as men, except that the nectar is stirred with the back instead of the edge of the knife. The children of Sikhs go through this ceremony at an early age.*

* Govind, who instituted the pahal, it is said, went through this form with five of his followers, drinking of the water which had washed each other's feet.

The government of the Sikhs was originally founded upon their religion, and even now they regard their Khalsa, or commonwealth, as a theocracy, taking in a literal sense the dying expressions of Guru Govind. "I have delivered over the Khalsa," said he to those who surrounded his bed, inquiring to whom he would bequeath his authority, "to God, who never dies. I have been your guide, and will still preserve you; read the Grant'h, and observe its injunctions, and whoever remains true to the state, him will I aid." Hence the Sikhs believe that they were placed by their last and most revered pontiff under the peculiar care of God. Until the late Runjeet Singh overthrew the republican form of government, their chief ruler professed himself the servant of the Khalsa, which acted, in times of great emergency, by means of a national council, the Guru-mata, of which every chief was a member, and this council was supposed to deliberate and resolve under the immediate inspiration and impulse of that invisible being who always watched over the interests of the commonwealth.

The duty, or privilege, of convening the Guru-mata, or great national council, which was intended to exercise a supreme authority over the republic, belonged to, or was assumed by, the Akalis, a class of devotees, who, under the double character of fanatical priests and desperate soldiers, usurped the sole direction of affairs at Amritsur, and were consequently the leading persons in a council, held at that sacred place, which deliberated under the influence of religious enthusiasm.

The Akalis were first established by Guru Govind, whose institutes they zealously defended against the innovations of Banda. Their name is derived from Akali-purusha, 'Worshippers of the Eternal,' the word Akal being a compound of kal, 'death,' and the privative a, meaning 'never-dying,' or 'immortal.' It is one of the epithets of the Deity, and is given to this class from their exclaiming "Akai, Akai," in their devotions. They wear blue chequered dresses, and bangles or bracelets of steel round their wrists, which all Sikhs do not wear; though it is indispensable to have steel about the person, generally in the shape of a knife or dagger. They formerly initiated converts, and had almost the sole direction of the religious ceremonies at Amritsur, of which they still claim to be the defenders. They have a fine bunga, or temple, on the bank of the sacred tank or reservoir at that place. Though possessed of property, they affect poverty, and extort alms from chiefs and others, by interdicting them from the performance of religious rites; a chief unpopular with the Akalis, who make common cause with each other, risks his authority. The Akalis have a great interest in maintaining the religion and government of the Sikhs, as established by Guru Govind, upon which their influence depends.

When a Guru-mata is called (as it ought to be upon any emergency), the Sikh chiefs and leaders assemble at Amritsur, and the council is convened by the Akalis; all private animosities are then supposed to cease, and every man is expected to sacrifice his personal feelings and interests to the good of the Khalsa. When the members are seated, the holy books are placed before them, to which they bend their heads, with the customary exclamations, "Wah ! Guruji ka Khalsa ! Wah ! Guruji ki Fateh !" Cakes, made of wheat, butter, and sugar, are placed upon the sacred volumes, covered with a cloth. These holy cakes (made in commemoration of an injunction of Nanuk) receive the salutation of the assembly: the members then rise; the Akalis pray aloud, and musicians play. When the prayers are finished, the Akalis desire the council to sit, and the cakes, being uncovered, are eaten by all classes, high and low, and whether of Hindu or Mahomedan family (for distinctions of original creed, and even of caste, have crept into their constitution), as a token of union in one common cause. The Akalis then exclaim, "Sirdars (chiefs), this is a Guru-mata;" upon which, prayers are again said aloud. The chiefs then swear upon the sacred Grant'h to forget all feuds, and to join heart and soul in one common object. Under the excitement of religious fervour and patriotic devotion, they proceed to consider the danger which threatens the country, and the best means of averting it, and to choose the commander of the Khalsa armies.

Since the cessation of the Guru-matas, the Akalis have lost much of their influence; they are not regarded as priests, but as ruffian soldiers, and are not confined to Amritsur, but are to be found all over the Punjab, and even in British India. The Grant'his, or readers of the Grant'h, and the Pujaries, or priests, even at Amritsur, are no longer Akalis.

The head of the Khalsa, both spiritual and temporal, was the supreme priest or pontiff; the principal chiefs (all descended from Hindu tribes) exercised local authority, receiving a share of the revenue they collected. Their little village communities, termed sangats, were under the direction of a headman. Their laws were imperfect, the principles alone being deduced from their scriptures, which inculcate general maxims of justice, but contain no fixed code. Arbitration was, and is still, the common mode of deciding civil questions, which is formally conducted in a Punchayet, or 'Court of Five.' Other questions are referred to the heads of villages, or to the chiefs, and their adjudication, when by consent, is final. In criminal cases, the chief punishes the offender ; but more generally, even in cases of murder, retaliation is resorted to and permitted. But these subjects will be more fully treated in the succeeding chapter.

Manners.—The accomplishments of reading and writing are uncommon amongst the Sikhs, and are chiefly confined to Hindu and Musulman mutsuddees, or clerks, who acquire a sufficient knowledge of the Persian language to enable them to keep the accounts, and to conduct the epistolary correspondence of the chiefs. The Gurmukha, or Punjabi written dialect, is familiar to many Sikhs; but, in general, they express a rooted aversion to the acquisition of the Arabic and Persian languages, resulting chiefly from the ideas instilled, and prejudices imbibed, in early age, against every thing, however useful and rational, that bears relation to, and is connected with, the religion and education of the Musulmans.

Concerns are transacted by oral testimony, verbal agreements, and promises. The test of right is confined to the memory of the oldest inhabitants of a neighbourhood, and tradition preserves old customs. Falsehood, fraud, and perjury are the natural concomitants of such a mode of conducting affairs. Money, fear, and favour can purchase an oath, can determine a village boundary dispute, and screen a criminal from detection, and the infliction of punishment. In some instances, an accused person will call for the dibb, or ordeal of innocence, plunge his fingers in boiling oil, bear a heated ploughshare on his hands for 50 to 100 yards, challenge his accuser to the trial by water, and, if he escape unhurt, his purity is declared, and freely acknowledged.

Witchcraft and spells (jadoo and moot) have a powerful influence over the fancies and actions of the chiefs and other inhabitants of the Sikh states. A sudden indisposition, a vomiting of blood, or any unusual ailment, for the nature and cause of which a native cannot very readily account, are generally attributed to the malice and invention of a rival, or to an evil-disposed member of the family. The possession of a waxen or dough effigy, some party-coloured threads, and small human bones, discovered in the dwelling, or about the person, of a suspected individual, are convincing proofs of guilt and wickedness.

“The harmless flame, which insensibly,” says Gibbon, “melted a waxen image, might derive a powerful and pernicious energy from the affrighted fancy of the person whom it was maliciously designed to represent.” One of the reasons Raja Juswunt Singh, of Nabah, assigned for his wish to disinherit his eldest son and heir was, that he had been engaged in some mischievous practices, and destructive enchantments, with one Bhae Dighanu, to ruin the health of his father. Sirdar Bhoop Singh, of Roopur, advanced a similar charge against his uncle, Darwa Singh. Both these chiefs bear the character of being well-informed men, and wiser than their neighbours. Rutun Koonwur, the widow of Muhtab Singh, chief of Thanesur, adopted a sickly boy, to whom she became immoderately attached, and vainly hoped he might be admitted to succeed to the landed property she held for life. In 1828, the boy died, and Rutun Koonwur, in a paroxysm of grief, filed a formal complaint, charging his death, through magical arts, to her nephew, Jumerut Singh, producing in court some body-clothes, and on no better evidence, directing her vakeel to prosecute him for murder. The case was set at rest by reasoning on its absurdity, and Rutun Koonwur consoled herself by the adoption of another boy. In September, 1829, a thanadar of the Thanesur Rani hanged a Bramin suspected of magic. The Rani dismissed the thanadar from his situation.

Good and bad omens, lucky and unlucky days, and particular hours of the day and night for commencing a journey and returning home, are carefully observed by the Sikhs, and by all other classes in the Punjab, whether engaged in the most momentous enterprises, or in the common concerns of life. To hear a partridge call on your right hand as you enter a town—cranes passing from left to right—meeting a bare-headed person—a jackass braying as you enter a town or village—a dog shaking his head and ears on quitting home—to meet a corpse or a Bramin—to hear a female jackal howling during the night—sneezing on going out or coming into a house or room, &c. &c., are bad omens. The contrary are good omens: to hear a partridge call on your left—cranes passing from right to left—to meet a Mehtur or Sweeper—to behold pearls in your sleep, &c. If a Mussulman dream of seeing the moon, it is as good as an interview with the prophet.* Prior to the field being taken with an army,† a visit of ceremony being paid to a distant friend, or a pilgrimage being made, the Muhurut, or auspicious moment for departure, and return, must be predicted by a Pundit, and the Pundit on his part is guided by the jogme, or spirits, which pervade every quarter of the compass. To avert the pernicious consequences likely to ensue from unfavourable prognostics or dreams, charity is recommended, and in general given very freely, on such occasions, by natives of rank and wealth. These, and many hundred other absurd prejudices and superstitious notions, are carried into the most solemn affairs of state. It was no uncommon practice of Runjeet Singh, when he contemplated any serious undertaking, to direct two slips of paper to be placed on the Granth Sohil, or sacred volume of the Sikhs. On the one was written his wish, and on the other the reverse. A little boy was then brought in, and told to bring one of the slips, and, whichever it might happen to be, his highness was as satisfied as if it were a voice from heaven. A knowledge of these whims and prepossessions is useful and necessary. They obtain, under varied shapes, and in diversified shades, throughout the Eastern world, warping the opinions, and directing the public and private affairs, of all ranks in society, from the despot to the peasant, from the soldier in the battle-field, to the criminal at the tree of execution.*

* An eminent native merchant came to me on business from Amritsur, and died at Lodiana, of the cholera morbus. His followers very gravely told me that my remedies must be unavailing, for, on entering the town, many bare-headed men of the Goojur caste had been met by the deceased.

† A gang of burglars being brought before me, in 1819, admitted in evidence, that two pieces of coloured muslin had been tossed over their left shoulders, on hearing a jackal call on their right hand, soon after quitting Kurnal, where the burglary had been perpetrated. Deesa-sool are unlucky days—Saturday and Monday, to the east—Sunday and Friday, to the west—Tuesday

Administration of Justice.—In the Sikh states, the administration of civil and criminal justice is vested in the Sirdar or chief. Crimes and trespasses, as in the middle ages, are atoned for by money: the fines are unlimited by any rule, and generally levied

* When the Sirhind division, composed entirely of sipahees, was directed, under the command of Sir David Ochterlony, against the Goorkha power, in 1814, it was suggested by Nund Singh, the accredited agent of Runjeet Singh, that the first march should be made at the dussera. It being mentioned to him, that this was too early, he begged that the tents and a few men might move out on that day. He was gratified, and the success that attended this division in all its operations was attributed more to the choice of an auspicious hour, than to the wisdom, prudence, and gallantry of its commander, his officers, and men.

arbitrarily, according to the means of the offender, whose property is attached, and his family placed under restraint, to enforce payment. These amerciaments form a branch of revenue to the chief, and a fruitful source of peculation to his officers, who too frequently have recourse to the most harsh and cruel means to elicit confessions, and extort money for real or imaginary offences. He who gains his point, pays his Shookurana, or present of gratitude, and he who is cast, pays his Jureemana, or penalty. The wealthy may secure justice, but the indigent are likely to obtain something less. The larger the bribe the more chance of success. A case where the right is clear and undeniable is often allowed to lie over, that the present may be augmented. All officers under the chief, and employed by him in districts and departments, follow his example, but are ultimately thrown into a bora, or dungeon, and required to refund; and, when they have satisfied the cupidity of their superior, they are generally permitted to resume their functions, honoured with the shawl, as a mark of favour. Capital punishment is very seldom inflicted. The most incorrigible culprits are punished with the loss of either one or both hands, and deprivation of nose or ears; but mutilation is rare, for whoever has the means to pay, or can procure a respectable security to pay for him within a given time, may expiate the most heinous transgressions.*

On the commission of a daka or burglary, a guzzakee,† or highway robbery, the chief, within whose jurisdiction the act has been perpetrated, is called upon to make restitution; and, should he decline, the chief whose subject has suffered resorts to the lex talionis, and drives off several hundred head of cattle, or retaliates in some way or other. This summary method of obtaining indemnification for all robberies attended with aggravating circumstances is a measure of absolute necessity, as many of the petty

* Statutes were passed in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Elizabeth, and James I., sanctioning and directing the loss of the right and left hand, and of an ear, for offences which would by a Sikh scarcely be deemed deserving the infliction of a mulct.

When a petty theft is substantiated, either through the medium of a muhur-khae, or the production of a mooddo or numoona (the confession of one of the thieves, or a part of the stolen property), the sufferer has generally, as a preliminary, to pay the churum, or fourth, as a perquisite to the chief, or his thanadar, ere he can recover the amount of his losses. Independent of this, the muhurkhae, or approver, generally stipulates for a full pardon, and that no demand shall be made on the confessing delinquent for his kundee, viz., any or such portion of the property as may have accrued to him as his dividend of the spoil. This share of the spoil becomes chargeable to the other thieves, and on settling accounts it is distributed equally amongst them.

In all cases of stolen cattle, it is an established rule, when the sooragh-khoj, or trace of the footsteps, is carried to the gate, or into the fields, of any village, the zemindars of that village must either shew the track beyond their own boundary, and allow the village to be searched, or pay the value of the cattle.*

Rules of Succession.—The rules of succession to landed property in the Sikh States are arbitrary, and are variously modified in accordance with the usages, the interests and prejudices of different families, nor is it practicable to reduce the anomalous system to a fixed and leading principle. A distinction obtains, in the Canons of Inheritance, between the Manjee and Malawa Sikhs, or Singhs : the former are so termed from the tract situated between the Ravi and Beas rivers, from which they originally sprung, migrating thence and extending their conquests through the Punjab, and into the Sirhind province, where, being of a military and predatory character, they soon conquered for themselves a permanent possession. The Malawa chiefs are, the Puteala, Jheend, and Naba Rajahs, and the Bhae of

* Hume, in treating of the Anglo-Saxons, says, "If any man could track his stolen cattle into another's ground, the latter was obliged to shew the tracks out of it, or pay their value."

Khytul. The three first-named are descendants of a common ancestor, named Phool, who was choudhuri of a village near Bahlenda, and are from him often collectively styled the Phoolkean. The progenitor of the Bhae of Khytul, having rendered some service to one of the Sikh Gurus, the appellation of Bhae, or 'brother,' was conferred upon him, as a mark of distinguished approbation; and the persons of all the Bhaes are consequently held in a degree of respect above their fellows.

The practice of succession to property, both real and personal, amongst the Manjee Singhs, is by bhae-bund and choonda-bund: the first being an equal distribution of all lands, forts, tenements, and moveables, among sons, with, in some instances, an extra or double share to the eldest, termed "Khurch-Sirdari," assimilating to the double share in the law of Moses.* Choonda-bund is an equal division among mothers for their respective male issue.†

* Deuteronomy, chap. xxi. vv. 15, 16, 17.

† This practice of choonda-bund is agreeable to the Hindu Law. Vyara says, "If there be many sons of

When a Manjee Singh dies, leaving no male offspring, his brothers, or his nephews of the full blood, assume the right of succession, to which the widow or widows become competitors. According to the Shasters (if they may be considered applicable to public property and chiefships), the prior title of the widows is held;* but the Sikhs, with a view to avoid an open and direct violation of a known law, have a custom, termed kurawa or chadur-dula, which obtains in every family, with the exception of those of the Bhaes. The eldest surviving brother of the deceased places a white robe over, and the neeth, or ring, in the nose of, the widow, which ceremony constitutes her his wife.

This practice accords with the Hindu and one man, by different mothers, but in equal number and alike by class, a distribution amongst the mothers is approved 'to Brihaspati.' If there be many springs from one, alike in number and in class, but born of rival mothers, partition must be made by them, according to law, by the allotment of shares to the mothers.

* In the Bengal and most generally current Shasters, this is the rule: but not in the Mithila province (Tirhoot, &c.); the widow is there excluded, and receives only a maintenance.

Mosaic laws,* and acts as a counter-agent to the many evils attendant on female rule. If the free will of the widow were consulted, it is scarcely to be doubted, she would prefer the possession of power, and the charms of liberty, to the alternative of sacrificing her claims to her brother-in-law, and taking her station amongst his rival wives. Judging from the masculine disposition—want of modesty and of delicate feeling, which form the characteristic feature of Sikh females, necessity, and not choice, must have led them to yield to the adoption of an usage, which must often be repugnant to their natures, and disgusting to their thoughts.

On failure of brothers and nephews, the general practice is, equal division of lands and personal effects, amongst the surviving widows of Manjee Singhs.

Adoption by the widows is not allowed, and the female line is entirely excluded from the succession, to prevent the estates merging in the possessions of another family.

The inconvenience and evil originating in the prevailing practice amongst the Manjee families, of successive and minute sub-divisions of landed property, aggravated by the system of coparcenary possession, are seen, felt, and acknowledged, and the mischief of such a system cannot be too soon remedied.

Amongst the Malawa Singhs, the rights of primogeniture in the males are respected, and jagirs, or grants of land, are assigned for the maintenance of younger sons, by which the many inconveniences, noticed in the practice or rule established amongst the Manjee families, are obviated.

The Malawa Singhs, with the exception of the Bhaes, sanction and admit the usage of kurawa, thereby opposing a bar to disputed succession between the brothers, nephews, and the widows of a deceased chief. The Bhaes of Khytul and other places, although they reject the union by kurawa, yet set aside the claims of a widow, in favour of the brothers and nephews of one dying without male issue. The widows of Bhaes re-

The Mahomedan families scattered over the Sikh states, who have been enabled to preserve their existence and the shadow of power, reject the ordinances of their law-givers, and are guided by rules of their own forming. Were the Mahomedan and Hindu laws on inheritance, as inculcated by the Shura and Mitakshara, to be made the leading principle in succession to landed property, very few, if any, of the many principalities in India would remain entire, and a common distribution would become universal, to the extinction of great estates, and the annihilation of the chiefs with their aristocratical influence.

Boundary Disputes.—When the country, overrun by the Sikhs, had been parcelled out into new allotments, the former divisions into districts, as established during the reigns of the Delhi emperors, and recorded by the kanoongoes, or rule-tellers, became void, and much angry litigation arose, in respect to the village boundaries and waste lands. The cultivators originated the cause of dispute, and the effect was, in most cases, an appeal to arms, and an effusion of blood, before the claims of the parties could be heard and decided by a convention of neighbouring zemindars, selected to draw a line of demarcation, and bound by a solemn oath to act impartially.*

The litigants made choice of an equal number of moonsifs, or arbitrators, in some cases one each, in others, two or three each. These committees would prolong their sittings for weeks and months, being all the while fed and paid by the parties, caressed and threatened by their chiefs, their relatives and friends, influenced by party spirit, governed by fear, and little verifying the saying common amongst them, of "Punch men Purmesur."† Five different modes of accommodation were in general adoption amongst these Punchayets. 1st. An equal division of the land in dispute. 2nd. The Panchayet selected the oldest and most respectable member of their committee, to define the limit, the others consenting to abide by his award. 3rd. A moiety of the line of demarcation was drawn by the arbiters of the one party, and the remaining portion by those of the other. 4th. The Panchayet referred the final adjustment to an old inhabitant of a neighbouring village, upon whose local knowledge and experience they placed more reliance than on their own limited information. 5th. It sometimes occurred to the Panchayet to leave the division in the hands of one of the disputants, whose probity was established in the vicinity.

Village boundary disputes, attended with aggravating circumstances, between the chiefs and cultivators of contiguous and rival states, are of daily occurrence, and the right and title to the smallest slip of land is contested with an obstinacy quite disproportionate to its intrinsic value. Little attention is paid by the chiefs or their subjects to the justice or reasonableness of a case ; it is quite sufficient, according to Sikh notions, that a claim be advanced and presented, as something may be obtained, and nothing can be lost, by the reference to a Panchayet, which will use its endeavours to please, and harmonize its decision to the wants and wishes of those by whom it has been selected. Bloodshed between zemindars, in a boundary dispute, is sometimes atoned for by giving a nata, or daughter, in marriage to a relative of the deceased, or commuted to the payment of 150 to 200 rupees, or 125 bigahs of land. In general, however, revenge is sought, and the khoonbuha, or price of blood, deemed insufficient satisfaction, particularly when a mother has to lament the loss of a favourite child, or a wife, with a family, the bereavement of a husband.

Claims to islands in a river flowing between two manors, and to alluvions, are determined by what is called the kuchmuch, or kishti-bunna, which practice or rule assigns the land to the proprietor of the bank, or main, upon which the alluvion is thrown, and from which the water has receded. If the island be formed in the centre of the river, and there be depth of water on each side of it sufficient for boats to ply, in this case it becomes the joint property of the chiefs on both banks. This custom which obtains in the Sikh states, with regard to alluvion, is universal in India, wherever lands are liable to such accident by an alteration in the course of rivers. In the case of lands cast by the change of the stream from one side of the river to the other, though one chief gains, and another loses, yet it is customary to preserve the rights of the zemindar, if he consent to cultivate the lands. The decided enmity of two chiefs is seldom a bar to an arrangement, in which each finds or perceives an advantage to himself, either immediate or prospective; for streams in India are so subject to change, that the land lost one rainy season may be regained in the next, or even in the cold weather, when the river falls and the floods cease.

Water-Courses.—The use and abuse of the ancient privilege of the zemindars, in damming up and turning the course of a stream into artificial khools or cuts, for the purpose of irrigating the lands in its vicinity, causes disputes and bloodshed; and after much angry dissension, the result is generally a compromise, stipulating for a reciprocal enjoyment of the gifts of nature. In some instances, and in contiguous estates, the parties will agree to take equal shares of the water, either by the hour or the day, or by measurement; in other cases, one will receive two-thirds, and his neighbour one-third only, according to their respective and pressing wants. The landholders, whose possessions are adjacent to the hills, from which, and their base, these streams and springs take their rise, require and demand a very large portion of the water for their rice lands, into which it is diverted by numberless water-courses, drawn with great ingenuity by the cultivators into distant and countless parterres. Those who hold land at a distance, and lower down the river, in the more arid districts, are querulous that the streams do not flow unobstructed in their natural course, which would give them the unabsorbed portion to irrigate their wheat and barley crops.

It seems to be a question how far a chief may be justified in entirely obstructing the course of a natural stream, and in appropriating the waters to his own exclusive advantage, to the serious detriment and loss of his neighbours, whose rights he may seem bound to respect, so far as they have relation to property. On the whole, it appears most just, that all should partake, as far as circumstances will admit, of a share in the water of a natural stream, or rivulet, and that when the absolute wants of those on the upper part of the stream have been supplied, the surplus should be again turned into, and permitted to flow in, its bed, to satisfy others lower down, whether for irrigation, or the consumption of the people and cattle in the arid districts. The lesser currents do not swell in the hot months, as is the case with the larger rivers which debouche from the Himalaya, and are fed in warm weather by the liquefaction of the snow: the supply of water in them is hence often so scanty, as scarcely to administer to the necessities of those near their heads, whilst the distress of others farther down the stream induces them to become more clamorous as the quantity decreases, and ultimately stops short of them.

Bunds, or dams, are always constructed after the rains have ceased, to raise the water to a level with the surface, and to render it applicable to the purposes of irrigation; were a total prohibition of this beneficial practice to be enacted, large tracts on many estates, through which streams flow in deep channels, would become uncultivated, and the villages depopulated, to the serious loss of the proprietors, and the ruin of their zemindars. With the view of relieving the deficiencies experienced from the want of the fluid in the arid districts lower down, a substitute for the dam might be found in a hydraulic wheel, of simple construction, to draw the water to the level; and in places where the banks are comparatively low, it will only be necessary to dig the khool, or cut, for the reception and carriage of the water, deeper, and to raise it in the cut by sluice-boards. The churras, or leathern bags, in common use at wells, with a relief of bullocks, might also be serviceable in other spots. All these expedients, however, fall very short of the utility and cheapness of the dams, when water requires to be conveyed many miles, and every khool is a canal in miniature.

Marriages.—Nuptial contracts are made in early youth by the parents or nearest of kin, who, in too many cases, are influenced more by pecuniary and sordid motives, than by the welfare of the children. Disagreements are very common relative to betrothments (mungnee), and to breaches of a promise of marriage (nata or nisbut), amongst all classes of the inhabitants. In some instances, real or imaginary diseases, or bodily defects, will be alleged, by one of the contracting parties, as a reason why the bargain should be annulled; in others, a flaw in the caste, and in most a discovery that the girl had been promised to two, three, or four different families, from all of which the needy parents or guardians had received money, ornaments, or clothes. If both parties be the subjects of one chief, they appear before him, and either he, or his officer, satisfies them, or refers the decision to a Punchayet of the same class as the disputants. If the complainant and defendant happen to reside in separate jurisdictions, and either of the chiefs persevere in evading a compliance with the rule in such cases, or reject the award of a Punchayet, gaha, or self-indemnification, is adopted by the opposite party, and the subjects, property, and cattle of his neighbour are picked up and detained until satisfaction be offered and procured. The other side issues its letters of marque, and this pernicious system is frequently carried to the commission of serious outrage, and to infractions of the public tranquillity.*

It is not a rare occurrence for a parent or a guardian to be convicted of marrying a girl to one man after her betrothment to another. The chief, or a Punchayet, in general, in such cases, gives a verdict that the plaintiff is entitled to a female from the family; and, if there be not one, the parents or guardian must find a substitute; or, as a last expedient, to which the injured party very unwillingly assents, the money he may have expended, or a trifle in excess with interest, is decreed to be restored to him, that he may find a spouse elsewhere.

* A demand was made on the state of Putteala, by a subject of the Naba Rajah, for the price of a buffalo, valued at fifteen rupees, but which, on the settlement of the account by reprisal, exceeded 900. Between the same states, and by the same system, one rupee accumulated in a few years to 1,500.

Amongst all the Jat families,* and some others of the lower classes in the Punjab, a custom prevails, on the demise of one brother, leaving a widow, for a surviving brother to take his sister-in-law to wife by kurawa or chadurdula. The offspring by the connection are legitimate, and entitled to succeed to a share of all landed and personal property.†

It is optional with the widow to take

* Intermarriages between the Jat Sikh chiefs and the Aloowalea and Ramgurhea families do not obtain, the latter being kubals and thokas (mace-bearers and carpenters), and deemed inferior.

† The present Rajah of Naba, Juswunt Singh, and six of the Singh-Poorea chiefs, are by a connubial union of this nature. Maha Raja Runjeet Singh went some steps further: he took by kurawa a lady betrothed to his father, Maha Singh: he also took Dya Koonwur and Rutun Koonwur, the widows of Saheb Singh, the chief of Goojrat, his own uncle-in-law.

either the eldest (jeth) or the youngest, who is generally preferred and deemed most suitable. Should she determine to relinquish worldly ideas, and to reside chaste in her father-in-law's house, she may adopt this course; but such instances are very rare, particularly in the case of young females, and are not to be looked for in a society, and amongst tribes, notorious for the laxity of their morals and for the degeneracy of their conceptions.

In default of surviving brothers, and in accordance with acknowledged usage, the widow is at the disposal of her father-in-law's family. From the moment she has quitted the paternal roof, she is considered to have been assigned as the property of another, and ceases to have a free will. Where the hymeneal bond is so loosely and irrationally knit, it is not a matter of surprise, that the feeble tie and servile obligation, which unite the wife to the husband, should make but an insincere and heartless impression. Females are daily accused, before chiefs and their officers, of breaches of conjugal virtue, and of having absconded to evade the claims of a father, or mother-in-law, or the established rights of a jeth, or a daiwar. When they have fled into the territory of another chief, it is often difficult to obtain their restitution; but the solicitations of a Panchayet, and the more forcible argument of reprisals, are in the end efficacious, and the unfortunate woman, if she do not in a fit of desperation take opium, or cast herself into a well, is necessitated to submit to the law of the land, which she will again violate on the first opportune occasion. A sense of shame, or feeling of honour, has no place in the breast of a Jat,* and the same may be said of men of other low tribes. They will make strenuous exertions for recovery of their wives, after they have absconded, and will take them back as often as they can get them, bickering even for the children the women may have had by her paramour, as some recompense for her tem-

Debtors and Defaulters.—Debtors and revenue defaulters who abscond, and find protection in a foreign state, are seldom demanded, and, if demanded, never surrendered by even the most petty chief. The promise is made, that, when the delinquent has the means, he shall discharge whatever sum may appear, on a scrutiny into his accounts, to be fairly due by him. It is not uncommon for a deputation, composed of the heads, or of some respectable inhabitants, of a town or village, from which a person has removed, to proceed and wait upon the chief with whom a fugitive may find an asylum, and, entering into stipulations for his personal safety, to receive him back, if he be willing to return.

Endowments.—In the Sikh states there are no compulsory laws for raising money for the relief of the indigent. Most fakirs belong to a punt, or sect, and each sect has its temples, which are endowed with lands and villages (termed oordoo and poora) by the chiefs, and to which churhawa, or offerings of grain and money, are made by its votaries. An eleemosynary establishment is sometimes founded, in places of great resort, by chiefs and wealthy natives, and named suda-birt, at which every stranger is entertained for a certain number of days, and fed gratis. Every Hindu temple has its muhunt or head, to whom are attached his immediate chelas or followers, who parade the country, towns, and villages, asking or demanding charity, which forms the support of their superior and themselves, and is freely distributed to the needy stranger and weary traveller, who may stop at their gate, or desire a lodging and a meal within the courts of the thakoor-dwara.

The Musulman classes have their pirzadas, who make their rounds amongst their mooreeds, or disciples, and receive from them such neeaz, or offerings, as they can afford, or may choose to present. Since the decline of the Mahomedan, and the rise and establishment of the Sikh power, the pirzadas have to lament the loss in many instances, and the diminution in others, of their village endowments. They still retain, however, a portion of the lands they held during the reigns of the emperors of Delhi, attached to their principal rozas, tombs, or seminaries; but the rents from them, and the trifle given in neeaz, are barely sufficient to maintain themselves and families in respectable circumstances, and to support the khadims, or servitors, in constant attendance at the tombs of their saints.

Mendicants.—Every village, independent of the fixed dues to the blacksmith, carpenter, washerman, to choomars and sweepers, has its mulha, or incidental expenses, charged on its cultivators, for what are termed aya, gya, or grain, ghee, &c. given to wandering fakirs and needy passengers. The punch, or heads of the villages, who supply the mulha, collect it in cash from the villagers twice during the year, and it not unfrequently gives rise to altercation and dispute, from the real or supposed inclination of the punch to impose upon them, under the specious and pious name of charity, much of which finds its way into the collector's own pocket.

Hindu and Musulman fakirs are found located in and around every town and village, and each has his tukeeah, or place of abode, to which a few bigahs of land are assigned, the gift of the zemindars, who, in other respects, also, take care of the common holy fraternity, that their blessing may continue to be upon them.

Land Revenue.—The jinsee, or grain lands, are cessed by the kun (appraisement), or the butaee (division of the produce in the field); both are exceptionable. It requires a very discerning and experienced man to estimate the quantity in a field of standing grain. In some it is over, and in others under rated. The butaee is detailed and tedious; an establishment also is required to watch the different kulwara, or heaps of grain, on the field. Cultivators are apt to steal it during the night, and in stormy and wet weather, much of it is damaged ere it can be housed. It is a common saying, "Butaee lootae," or 'butaee is plunder.' Some chiefs exact a half of the produce, others two-fifths, and a few, one-fourth. Sugar-cane, cotton, poppy, indigo, and all the lands under the denomination of zubtee, are assessed at fixed rates, and the rent is received in cash.

In the Sikh states, the lands of most towns and villages are parcelled out into puttees, turufs, or divisions, amongst the punch, or zemindars, who are answerable for the sirkar's or ruler's share. In some, where there are no ostensible heads, the lands are held by hulsaree, or ploughs. Thus, if in a village society, there be twenty-five ploughs, and 2,500 bigahs, the jinsee and zubtee lands are equalized amongst the asamees, or husbandmen, which gives 100 bigahs to each plough, and each asamee pays his own rent, much on the principle of a ryotwar settlement. In general, the punch hold a few bigahs, and also the puchotrah (5 per cent.) on the net collections, in Inaum.

The system of assessment by the kun or butae pleases the agricultural community, and the chiefs, who pay their armed retainers and establishments every six months in kind, with a small sum in cash, called poshakee, or clothing: it also accords with their internal plan of management. On some small estates, with comparatively few followers, it works well, but it is not at all adapted to extended territory and great governments.*

Taxes.—The chief sources of oppression on the people, under Sikh rule, emanate, 1st, from the exaction of the siwae-juma, or extraordinary imposts, levied in cash on every village, under the general head of the huq-huboobnuzurbhét, and branching out into a variety of names; 2nd, the inhuman practice of kar-begar, or the impress of labour of the inhabitants without recompense; and 3rd, the violence to which they are exposed from licentious armed dependants, quartered in the forts and towers which cover the country, and prey on the villages.

Every major and minor chief exercises the privilege by prescription of taxing trade; yet the duties, though levied at every ten to twenty miles, are light. A practice called hoonda-bara prevails in the mercantile community. A trader gives over charge of his caravan of goods to a Nanukputra, who engages to convey it for a stipulated sum from Jughadri to Amritsur, the emporium of the Sikh states, paying all the duties. The Nanukputras, from the sanctity which attaches to their persons, as the descendants of Nanuk, the founder of the Sikh faith, enjoy certain exemptions, and are less subject to molestation from custom-house importunity than others. Beema, or insurance, may be had at a cheap rate from the Nauhureea merchants to all parts of India. Should any grievous or vexatious tax be imposed on the trade by a chief, he suffers an alienation of this branch of his revenue, by the route being changed through the possessions of another, who has the power to protect, and the inclination to encourage, the transit of traffic through his domains.*

* Runjeet Singh became anxious to establish a copper mint at Amritsur, and prohibited the importation of pice from Jughadri. The merchants of Jughadri re-

Suttees.—Sikh women do not usually burn with the corpses of their husbands. An exception occurred in 1805, in the town of Booreeah, on the death of the chief, Rae Singh, when his widow made a voluntary sacrifice of herself, rejecting a handsome provision in land. A more recent example (in 1839) occurred on the death of Runjeet Singh, when there were many suttees: the increase of the practice may be one symptom, amongst many, of the gradual inroads of Hinduism upon the Sikh institutions. There exists no prohibition against the suttee. In all cases they are understood to be willing victims, and much real or pretended dissuasion is exercised by the public functionaries, and by friends and relations, to divert the miserable creature from her destructive intentions. That affection and duty have not always place in this class of felo de se, which would explain and taliated, and withheld the exportation of copper from their town, and gained their point.

The Rajah of Puteala has attempted to raise the duties in trade, and failed, from his territory being avoided.

extenuate such a deed, and convert the offspring of superstition into a noble act of self-devotion, is obvious from the frequency of suttee, and from the fact that it is not only the favoured wife, but a whole host of females, that sometimes are offered up to blaze on the pyre of their deceased lord.*

In most cases of suttee, it will generally be observed, that a slow, reluctant promise has been exacted from, or made by, the wretched woman in an unguarded moment, when under the impulse of grief.† A multi-

A concourse of people instantly gathered around her, and the utmost excitement prevailed. Being absent at the time, the office moonshi, the thanadar of Umbala, and the soobadar on duty, all three Hindus of high caste, took upon themselves the task and responsibility of preventing the sacrifice, dispersed the multitude, and induced the young creature to await a reply to the express they had despatched to me. On the demise of the hill rajas of Belaspore and Nahun, in 1824 and 1827, there was no suttee, and the practice has disappeared in the hill states under the protection of British government.

HISTORY OF THE SIKH NATION.

A.D. 1707 TO 1761.

THE empire founded in Hindustan by Baber, and supported by the vigour and abilities of several generations of celebrated princes, fell speedily to dissolution after the accession of Mahomed Shah. The invasion of Nadir Shah gave a violent shock to its stability, which was already undermined by the growing power of the Mahrattas; and the inroads of the Abdali, Ahmed Shah, though made in support of the faith of Mahomed, and successful in checking that reaction of Hindu vigour which threatened at the time to

* This chapter is entirely from Captain Murray, who has the merit of being the first to collect and put together in a consistent narrative the loose fragments and materials that exist, in respect to the events in the Punjab at this period.—Note by Mr. Prinsep. The events of the Sikh history between 1707 and 1742 have been added by the present editor.

overwhelm it, accelerated, nevertheless, the fall of the house of Timur, which he uniformly treated with neglect and humiliation. The court of Delhi ceased thenceforward to be looked up to as the source of protection, of honours, or of punishments. The satraps and officers, nominally acting under its authority, assumed everywhere independence; the provinces were dismembered, and a spirit of disaffection was roused in all parts of the empire. The history of Hindustan ceases from this period to be that of any ruling dynasty, and must be traced in the detail of the events of each province, and in the transactions, by which the several nawabs, rajas, and princes,—the sects, nations, or associations of chiefs,—rose, each in turn, to power, in displacement of the royal authority, and in successful rivalry with one another.

The confusion which took place in the Indian provinces on the death of Aurungzeb, in 1707, was favourable to the designs of Banda, whose grief at the fate of Guru Govind is said by Sikh authors to have settled into a gloomy and desperate resolution to avenge his wrongs. The severities which had been inflicted upon the Sikhs, instead of crushing them, exalted their fanaticism, whilst they extinguished the humane and merciful feelings which Nanuk had laboured to instil. After plundering the country, and defeating most of the petty Mahomedan chiefs that were opposed to him in the Punjab, Banda thought himself sufficiently strong to contend in a pitched battle with Foujdar Khan, the governor of the province of Sirhind, a man abhorred by the Sikhs, as the murderer of the infant children of Guru Govind. The Mahomedans fought with valour, the Sikhs with all the desperation which the most savage spirit of revenge could inspire; and this, aided by the courage and conduct of their leader, gave them the victory, after a severe contest. Foujdar Khan fell, with most of his army; the enraged Sikhs gave no quarter, nor was their thirst for vengeance satiated by the destruction of the Mahomedan soldiers; they put to death the wife and children of Vizir Khan (who was concerned in the murder of Govind's family), and almost all the inhabitants of Sirhind. They destroyed, or polluted, the mosques of that city; butchered the mullahs, and, in the madness of their rage, dug up the carcases of the dead, and exposed them to be devoured by birds and beasts of prey. These acts of cruelty were almost entirely confined to the Mahomedans.*

Encouraged by this success, and hardened by the example and lessons of Banda to deeds of atrocity, the Sikhs rushed forward and subdued all the country eastward between the Sutluj and the Jumna; and, crossing this river, made inroads into the province of Saharanpur. This memorable incursion appears to have been one of the severest scourges with which any country was afflicted. Every excess that the most wanton barbarity could commit, every cruelty that an unappeased appetite of revenge could suggest, was perpetrated upon the miserable inhabitants of the provinces through which the exasperated fanatics passed. Life was only granted to those who conformed to the religion, and adopted the habits and dress, of the Sikhs; and if the Emperor Bahadur Shah had not quitted the Deccan, which he did in A.D. 1710, there is reason to think the whole of Hindustan would have been subdued by these merciless invaders.

The first check the Sikhs received was from an army under Sultan Kuli Khan. That chief defeated at Paniput one of their advanced corps, which, after being dispersed, fled to the country on the upper course of the Sutluj, between Lodiana and the mountains, from whence they soon after issued, and joined Banda at Sirhind, who ravaged the country as far as Lahore on one side and Delhi on the other.

Bahadur Shah now proceeded against the Sikhs in person. He drove them into the hills, and besieged Banda in the strong fort of Daber, at the entrance of the hills, which could only be reduced by famine. A strict blockade was kept up; the Sikhs endured the extremity of famine; vast numbers died, but Banda persisted in holding the fort till resistance was hopeless; when he made a desperate sally and escaped to the mountains with his principal followers. A Hindu convert, who had favoured the escape of Banda, by pretending to be that leader, was taken prisoner, and sent to Delhi inclosed in an iron cage. After the capture of Daber, the emperor returned to Lahore.

The death of Bahadur Shah, in 1712, prevented, perhaps, the extermination of the sect, and the confusion and dissensions in the empire which followed that event were favourable to the Sikhs, by allowing them to recruit their strength. Banda issued from his retreat in the hills, and defeated Islam Khan, the viceroy of Lahore, and the foudar or chief of Sirhind, who had marched out of that town to encounter them, was assassinated in his tent by one of these fanatics. The Sikhs now ravaged the level country with greater fury than before. At length, in 1716, Abdul Samad Khan, governor of Cashmere, a general of great reputation, was despatched, with a large army, by the Emperor Farokhseir, against the heretics, whom he worsted in several actions, and finally defeated in a very desperate engagement, in which Banda performed prodigies of valour, but was obliged to give way to the superior number and discipline of the imperialists. The Sikhs, unable to make a stand after this defeat, were hunted, like wild beasts, from one stronghold to another, by the army of the emperor, and their leader and his most devoted followers were at last taken, after having suffered the extremes of hunger and fatigue.

Abdul Samad Khan put to death great numbers of the Sikhs, after the surrender of Lohgud, the fortress in which they took refuge; but sent Banda and the principal chiefs of the tribe, with 740 others, to Delhi, where they were paraded through the streets on camels, dressed in black sheep-skins with the wool outside (in derision of the shaggy appearance they affected), and after experiencing every kind of insult, amid the maledictions of the populace, they were beheaded on seven successive days. A Mahomedan writer* attests the intrepidity with which these Sikh prisoners, but particularly their leader Banda, met death. "It is singular," he writes, "that these people not only behaved firmly during the execution, but they would dispute and wrangle with each other who should suffer first, and they made interest with the executioner to obtain the preference." Banda was reserved till the last. He was exhibited in an iron cage, clad in a robe of cloth of gold and a scarlet turban, an executioner standing behind him with a drawn sword. Around him were the heads of his followers on pikes, and on one pike a dead cat was fixed. When the moment of execution arrived, with a refinement of cruelty, Banda's infant son was placed in his lap, and he was ordered to cut its throat, and upon his refusing,* the child was butchered before him, and its heart cast into his face. The flesh of Banda was then torn off with red-hot pincers till he expired, "glorying," say the Sikh writers, "in having been raised up by God to be a scourge to the wicked;" whereas, according to Gholam Huseen, "his black soul took its flight to the regions of hell."

"Thus," says Sir John Malcolm, "perished

* Some accounts say that he stabbed the child.

Banda, who, though a brave and able leader, was one of the most cruel and ferocious of men, and endeavoured to impart to his followers that feeling of merciless resentment which he cherished against the whole Mahomedan race, whom he appears to have thought accountable for the cruelty and oppression of a few individuals of the persuasion."

Though the Sikhs, being animated by a similar feeling, and encouraged by his first successes, followed Banda to the field, his memory is not revered, and he is termed, by some of their authors, a heretic, who, intoxicated with victory, endeavoured to change the religious institutions and laws of Guru Govind, many of whose most devoted followers he put to death, because they refused to depart from those usages which that revered spiritual leader had taught them to consider sacred. Among other changes, Banda wished to make the Sikhs abandon their blue dress, to refrain from eating flesh, and, instead of exclaiming, "Wah ! Guruji ki Fateh ! Wah ! Khalaii ki Fateh !" the salutations directed by Govind, he directed them to exclaim "Fateh D'herm ! Fateh Dersan !" which means, "Success to piety ! success to the sect !" These innovations were very generally resisted, but the dreaded severity of Banda made many conform to them. The class of Akalis, who had been established by Guru Govind, continued to oppose the innovations with great obstinacy, and many of them suffered martyrdom, rather than change either their mode of salutation, diet, or dress ; and at the death of Banda, all the institutions of Guru Govind were restored ; but the blue dress, instead of being, as at first, worn by all, appears, from that date, to have become the particular distinction of the Akalis.

After the defeat and death of Banda, every measure was taken that an active resentment could suggest, not only to destroy the power of the Sikhs, but to extirpate the sect. An astonishing number must have fallen in the last two or three years of the contest with the imperial armies, as the irritated Mahomedans gave them no quarter ; and after the execution of their chief, a royal edict was issued, ordering all who professed the religion of Nanuk to be taken and put to death wherever found. A reward was offered for the head of every Sikh; and all Hindus were ordered to shave their hair off, under pain of death. The few Sikhs that escaped this general execution fled into the mountains to the north-east of the Punjab, where they found a refuge from the persecution, while numbers, abandoning the outward usages of their religion, satisfied their consciences with the secret practice of its rites.

From the defeat and death of Banda till the invasion of India by Nadir Shah, a period of nearly thirty years, we hear nothing of the Sikhs; but when, on the decay of authority in the empire, that conqueror had possessed himself of Lahore and Delhi, in 1739, they are stated to have taken advantage of the confusion he created, and fallen upon the peaceable inhabitants of the Punjab, who sought shelter in the hills, and to have plundered them of that property which they were endeavouring to secure from the rapacity of the Persian invader. Enriched with these spoils, the Sikhs left their fastnesses in the hills, and built the fort of Dalewal, on the Ravi, from whence they made predatory incursions, and are said to have harassed and plundered Nadir Shah's army, on its return to Persia, encumbered with spoil.

In 1742, Yuhea Khan, the son of Zuka-rea Khan, commonly styled Khan Bahadur, held the viceroyalty of Lahore, when the Jat zemindars of the Punjab, impoverished by long extortion, and driven at last to desperation, took to rapine and plunder for the support of themselves and families, and as a bond of union and excitement against their oppressors, revived in their customs and ceremonies the latent flame of the Sikh ritual. They proclaimed the faith and tenets of Govind Singh, the last acknowledged Guru, or spiritual guide of the Sikhs, and took the pahal of initiation into the mysteries of that religion. The long hair on the head and flowing beard, the entire renunciation of tobacco, and the use of the audible salutation of "Wah Guruji ki Fateh," proclaimed that the ploughshare had been exchanged for the avenger's sword, and that the maxims and precepts of the Grant'h of Gurn Govind had prevailed over the more peaceable doctrines of the Vedas and Shastras of pure Hinduism. The spirit of the revived sect displayed itself at first in secret associations and isolated acts of depredation. Bodies of armed men, in tens and twenties, called dharwee in the dialect of the province, that is, highway-men, infested the routes of communication, attacked villages, or plundered in towns, according as their local connections invited to either mode of seeking wealth or the means of support. The early neglect of the ruling authority enabled the associations to prosper, and the most successful chiefs purchased horses with the proceeds of their spoil, and mounted and armed their followers. Their example and success made the cause popular with the young and adventurous, so that the number who took to these courses augmented daily, until the chiefs formed their respective dehras, or encampments, in open defiance of the ruling authority, and sought celebrity by bold and hardy enterprises, which gave security in the awe they inspired, while the wealth and reputation resulting afforded the means of further strengthening themselves. The distractions of the Mogul empire, and the intrigues and imbecility of the vice-regal court at Lahore, gave encouragement to the system pursued, not only by neglecting to punish, but by the occasional employment of the services of individual chiefs, so that many of them assumed an organized martial appearance, and, not content with ravaging the open country, approached the sacred reservoir of the Sikhs at Amritsur, and maintained themselves in that vicinity. The different associations were united by common interest, no less than by the profession of a new faith ; and a system of general confederation for defence, or for operations requiring more than single efforts, was early arranged between the chiefs.

The evil had spread and had acquired some head before the attention of the Governor, Yuhea Khan, was sufficiently roused to induce him to make an exertion to put it down. At length, however, his revenue failing from these disorders, he sent out a small detachment of government troops under command of Jusput Rae, brother of his dewan or prime minister, Lukhput Rae. They proceeded first against a body of insurgent Sikhs, who were devastating the country and driving off the flocks and herds in the vicinity of Yumeenabad, which lies to the north of Lahore. The detachment was overpowered, and Jusput Rae being slain, his men dispersed. Lukhput Rae, dewan, however, hastened from Lahore to avenge his brother's death, and the insurgents retreated before him into the north-eastern corner of the Punjab, where he inflicted on them a severe chastisement. The dewan brought back with him many prisoners, whose heads were struck off without remorse in the Ghora-Nukhas, or horse-market, outside the city wall of Lahore. The spot is now called by the Sikhs Shuheed-gunj, 'the place of martyrs,' in memory of this event, and a sumadh, or tomb, has been erected there in honour of the Bhae Jaroo Singh, which marks the site. After this success, a proclamation was issued in the name of the Governor, Yuhea Khan, denouncing death to all persons who invoked the name of Guru Govind, and a reward was offered for the heads of his disciples. This rigour and summary proscription checked the progress of Sikh proselytism, and the enthusiasm of the votaries of the Guru was considerably diminished. Many cut their long hair and curtailed their flowing beards to avoid detection and death, and others fled across the Sutluj into the adjoining province of Sirhind, where they found protection or concealment in the wide wastes which lie to the west of Puteala and Naba.

Not long after this event, the younger brother of Yuhea Khan, named Shah Nuwaz Khan, rose in insurrection against him, and succeeded in establishing himself in the two provinces of Lahore and Multan, making prisoner Yuhea Khan, with all his state officers. He nominated a Hindu, named Kaonra Mul, to be dewan in lieu of Lukhput Rae, but left Adena Beg Khan, who had risen under his father Zukarea Khan, and governed with much vigour the difficult district of the Jalendra Doab, in both civil and military charge of that tract. Yuhea Khan escaped from Lahore, and hastening to Delhi, laid his complaint before the Vuzeer, his uncle, Kumur-ud-deen Khan, who was at the same time privately informed that Shah Nuwaz Khan, in fear of the consequences of his act, had opened a correspondence with Ahmed Shah Abdali. The Shah had recently seized Cabul and Peshawur, ejecting the Delhi soobahdar, Nasir Khan, an event that had excited much alarm at the capital. The Vuzeer, availing himself of his relationship, appealed to his nephew's sense of honour, and addressed to him a strong remonstrance on his defection from allegiance, desiring him not to seek the degradation of serving Ahmed, the yusoul or mace-bearer of Nadir, but to be faithful to the hereditary sovereign of his family and race. The young man's pride was touched, and although doubtful what might be the issue of the complaint of his elder brother, he prepared himself to oppose the advance of the Duranis, and withdrew from further correspondence with Ahmed Shah. Undeterred by this change of councils, the Abdali crossed the Indus near the fort of Attock, in the year 1747, and sent his domestic priest, Sabir Shah, in advance, to Lahore, hoping through his negotiations or intrigues to bind Shah Nuwaz Khan to his first offers, or at all events to secure a friendly reception to his army. Shah Nuwaz, however, was now staunch in his allegiance to Delhi, and placed himself in the best posture of defence his scanty means would permit. He further gave to his court a pledge of fidelity by causing the agent of the Abdali to be murdered. Ahmed Shah was greatly incensed at this violence done to the person of his ambassador and confidential servant, and crossing the Ravi, marched immediately to attack Shah Nuwaz Khan in the intrenched position he had taken up under the walls of Lahore. The resistance offered was slight; the defences were soon mastered by the Durani warriors; Shah Nuwaz fled to Delhi; the city of Lahore was shortly after reduced, and its resources fell a prey to the Abdali, who raised there a heavy contribution.

Ahmed Shah, when at Delhi in the train of Nadir Shah, had not been an inattentive observer of the state of things at that court. The imbecility of Mahomed Shah, the overgrown power, discords, and intrigues of the great ameers, or grandees, and the little obedience paid to the royal authority, at the capital as well as in the interior, had not failed to attract his attention, and the confusion likely to follow the departure of the invading army afforded matter of speculation for an ambitious man seeking to push his own fortune. The unparalleled success which had attended his first efforts in Afghanistan, and the advantage to which he systematically turned his present means in laying the foundation of future grandeur, encouraged him to hope, from what he saw and heard of the condition of things at Delhi, that the time was favourable for an attempt to erect for himself an empire on the ruins of that of the house of Timur. Having mastered Lahore, therefore, he determined on an immediate advance towards Delhi, and crossing the Beas and Sutluj without opposition, he approached Sirhind.

The Vuzeer Kumpur-ud-deen Khan was not deficient in energy, and made preparation to meet the invader. Calling out the principal chiefs of Rajpootana, with their respective quotas, he placed the king's eldest son, Prince Ahmed, in nominal command, and with this force, and the troops at the capital, took up an intrenched position at the village of Munupore, nine miles from Sirhind. The Abdali Shah, having reconnoitred the position, deemed himself too weak to attempt a storm of the works. Encamping in the neighbourhood, therefore, he directed his efforts against the supplies of the Delhi army, and sent detachments to cut off convoys and intercept the communications with the capital. This led to continual skirmishes and partial engagements, which amused both armies for a month, without producing any thing decisive. An event, however, then occurred, which brought about an immediate change in the aspect of things. The Vuzeer was killed whilst at evening prayers, by a random shot from the Durani artillery, and from that time forward there ceased to be any commander-in-chief in the Delhi camp. The Rajpoot chiefs, who had come upon his invitation, and were held together by his influence and reputation, feeling confidence in no other leader, began to desert the royal standard, and retired to their respective estates. The Abdali, hearing of this, deemed the moment favourable to assume the offensive, and ordered an attack, notwithstanding the inferiority of his numbers. A panic seized the imperial army, and disorder began to spread in the camp. Meer Munoo, however, son of the deceased Vuzeer, at the critical moment, brought a body of fresh troops to the points assailed, led them himself to the charge, and repulsed the Duranis, with considerable slaughter; so that Ahmed Shah deemed it necessary to relinquish his designs for the present, and retired precipitately across the Punjab, in order to repair his losses. His retreat was unmolested, and he recrossed the Attock, without making any effort to maintain his footing at Lahore. The Punjab was thus recovered for the Mogul, and the government of Lahore and Multan was conferred by the Delhi court on Meer Munoo, with the title of Mooyyun-ul-Moolk, in reward and acknowledgment of his service on this important occasion.

The invasion of the Abdali, and the occupation of the forces on both sides in the struggle for empire on the plains of Sirhind, were favourable to the further rise of the Sikhs, whose depredations were, for the interval, unchecked, and who again shewed themselves by day, and ventured even to satisfy their religious prejudices, by stolen visits to the shrines of their faith at Amritsur. According to a contemporary Mahomedan author, they were often slain in these attempts, seeking, rather than avoiding, on such occasions, the crown of martyrdom. He adds, that "an instance was never known of a Sikh, taken on his way to Amritsur, consenting to abjure his faith." The new governor of Lahore, Meer Munoo, confirmed Kaonra Mul* in the office of dewan, and found the disorders created by these associations, and by fanatics of the sect, who sprung up in numbers, to be one of the first objects requiring his attention. A small party of Sikhs had the audacity to throw up a mud work, which they called Ram-Rouni (since enlarged, and now called Ramghur), in the district and immediate vicinity of Amritsur, and Sikh plunderers scoured the Bari and Jalendra doabs, making incursions into the neighbouring countries in all directions. Meer Munoo surrounded and captured Ram-Rouni, and stationed detachments to preserve the peace of the country, who had orders to detain all Sikhs, and to shave their heads and beards. By these energetic measures the public confidence was restored; the Sikhs were again compelled to fly the country, or hide their heads, and proselytes to their faith and habits became more rare.

Ahmed Shah Abdali had retired only to recruit his strength, and was by no means inclined to relinquish his designs on Hindustan. In the season following that of his first invasion, that is, after the close of the rains of 1748, he again crossed the Indus, and interrupted all Meer Munoo's plans for establishing himself in his government, and better ordering its administration. Being apprehensive that his force was too weak to resist the invader, he applied to Delhi for reinforcements; and in order to gain time, sent a mission to the Abdali camp, to offer terms of compromise, and negotiate for the Shah's retirement. He followed up this measure by himself moving out of Lahore, and pitched his camp at Soudhura, on the south bank of the Chenab. This state of preparation, and the known character of the Lahore viceroy, deterred the Abdali, for the time, from attempting to force his way into Hindustan. He was content, therefore, to accept a promise of the revenue of the four districts, Pursuroor, Goojrat, Seal-Kot, and Aurungabad, which had formerly been assigned to Nadir Shah, and then retraced his steps to Cabul.

This success of Meer Munoo, and the credit resulting from it, excited envy in the grandees at Delhi, and, instead of meeting further reward from the court, an intrigue there deprived him of the government of Multan, which was conferred on Shah Nuwaz Khan. The viceroy in possession, however, was not of a temper to submit patiently to such supersession, and he detached his minister, Kaonra Mul, to oppose the new governor. Shah Nuwaz Khan advanced to the frontier of Multan, with a force collected for the purpose of securing his investiture, but, finding himself overmatched, he could proceed no farther. For about six months he maintained himself on the frontier, without any thing decisive occurring, but at the end of that time he was induced to hazard a battle with the dewan, in which he was defeated and slain. Meer Munoo created Kaoura Mul raja for this service, and invested him with the subordinate charge of Multan and the adjoining districts.

As might be expected, Meer Munoo failed to remit to Cabul the revenues of the four districts stipulated, and the Abdali Ahmed Shah had thus a pretext for again crossing the Indus, which he did in the season 1751-2, and advanced to the right bank of the Chenab. Sookh Jeewun, a Hindu, was sent thence to Lahore, to demand the fulfilment of the engagement. Meer Munoo replied, that the promise had been made in the exigency of the moment, and he did not look upon himself as bound to abide by the strict letter, but free to act according to circumstances. He offered, however, to pay now what might be due, upon the condition of the Durani army being immediately withdrawn. Not expecting this offer to be accepted, Meer Munoo called in Adena Beg Khan and Raja Kaonra Mul, with their respective forces, to Lahore, where an intrenched camp was prepared at Shahdurra, in the environs. He himself advanced to meet the Abdali, and retired before him as he moved eastward, until both chiefs approached Lahore, when the viceroy entered his intrenched position under the walls of the city. For four months he maintained himself in this post, and was proof against every endeavour of the Shah to entice him out of his intrenchment. The blockade maintained was, however, strict, and supplies then began wholly to fail. The only food or forage for the horses and ammunition-cattle consisted of chopped straw from the roofs of huts and bazars, and grain and flour were selling at an exorbitant price. A council of war was called in this emergency, when Adena Beg gave it as his opinion that, as no succour or reinforcement could be expected from Delhi, an action ought to be risked before their provisions wholly failed, as might be expected in a few days, if the blockade continued. Raja Kaonra Mul was opposed to this advice; he observed, that the viceroy's troops were mostly raw levies, who were no match in the field for the hardy veterans of the Shah; that the country for a wide space round had been foraged and wasted, and the distress for provisions was not less in the Durani camp than in their own; that in twenty days more, the hot weather would set in, when the northern troops of the Shah would find the sun and wind intolerable in the plains, and hence would be compelled to retreat or to attack them in their lines to disadvantage. The advice of the Hindu was prudent, but the viceroy was young, and, from the impatience and impetuosity of youth, the opinion of Adena Beg fell more in accordance with his disposition. Early in the morning, therefore, of the 12th of April, 1752, his army moved from its lines and took up ground on an elevated spot, marked by an old brick-kiln. The Shah prepared immediately for action. His artillery was ordered to advance, and a cannonade was kept up between the two armies until the afternoon, when the Shah, observing some confusion, ordered a charge by a select body of cavalry, which was so far successful as to induce Meer Munoo to retire again within his intrenchments. In the retreat, Raja Kaonra Mul's elephant chanced to tread on an old grave, the earth of which sinking strained and nearly disabled the animal. Before the mahout could extricate him, the Raja was overtaken and slain by a Durani horseman, and his loss, when known in the intrenched camp, occasioned a panic and desertion so general, that the viceroy was compelled, by diminished numbers, to retire within the city wall. In this exigency Adena Beg Khan abruptly withdrew with his troops, and Meer Munoo, finding the fortifications of the city out of repair and untenable, was induced to yield to circumstances, and tendered his submission to the Shah. The Abdali was well pleased thus to close the campaign: he sent his principal officer, Juhan Khan, into the city to conduct the viceroy to his presence, and treated him with courtesy and respect, declaring his admiration of the determined spirit, conduct, and deportment displayed by him on all occasions. He exacted a large sum of money from him for the expenses of the campaign, and then reinstated him as viceroy on his own part, both of Lahore and Multan.

Before retiring to his own dominions, Ahmed Shah determined on the occupation of Cashmere, and a strong detachment was sent thither under the command of Abdulla Khan, who succeeded in penetrating to the valley, and establishing the Shah's authority there without opposition. The Hindu, Sookh-Jeewun, a Khatri of Cabul, was selected for the government, and the rainy season being now near, the Shah re-crossed the Indus, and carried back his army to Cabul.

Meer Munoo did not long survive these events: he was killed by a fall from his horse, whereupon his widow, a woman of spirit and address, proclaimed her infant son successor in the viceroyalty, and succeeded in establishing an administration in his name. Before ten months had expired, however, the infant died of the small-pox. The Begum then proclaimed herself, and despatched agents to Delhi and to Cabul to procure her acknowledgment. To the Vuzeer at Delhi her daughter was offered in marriage, and he came to the banks of the Sutluj to celebrate the nuptials. By these acts the Begum secured herself against present supersession.

A female viceroy was not likely to display much activity in suppressing associations like those of the Sikhs, which meddled not with her ease and pleasures at the seat of government. Their number and audacity accordingly increased rapidly, and bands of these bearded depredators were continually to be seen, traversing the various districts of the Punjab, sweeping off the flocks and herds, and laying waste the cultivation, unless redeemed by a prompt contribution. Disorder, anarchy, and confusion gained head in the province, as in all other parts of Hindustan.

It was not till after an interval of four years, that is, in the season 1755-6, that Ahmed Shah Abdali appeared again in the field. In all his previous incursions he had been met by the energy of the local governors, and the Delhi court had made efforts, or at least had displayed some interest and anxiety, in checking his advance. On the present occasion, such was the condition of wreck and revolution to which the empire was reduced, that no one offered anywhere to impede his march, and he traversed the Punjab and entered even the imperial city without experiencing the smallest opposition. His detachments plundered Mutra, and threatened the city of Agra, and the Shah, having formed a matrimonial connection with the family of Timur, laid the capital under heavy contribution, and confiscated to his own use the property of the grantees and principal inhabitants. His cupidity being thus satisfied, he retired, leaving the throne of the Mogul in the same weak hands and helpless condition in which he found it. But he seized on the Punjab and Sirhind, and gave the government of both provinces to his son Timur, with whom he left his confidential officer Juhan Khan and a detachment of troops of no great strength, and then returned to Cabul.

Since the death of Meer Munoo, Adena Beg Khan had assumed entire independence in his subordinate government in the Jalandra Doab, and had appropriated the revenues to his personal use. One of the first acts of the young Prince Timur was to summon this chief to Lahore, as a dependant of his government. The wary veteran, however, evaded prompt compliance, alleging the necessity of his presence in his districts to check the increasing audacity of the Sikhs, who were encamped in his vicinity, and, were he to desert his post, might secure a permanent hold in the country. The Afghan prince, not satisfied with this excuse, sent a detachment of his troops to seize Adena Beg; whereupon the latter strengthened himself by association with the Sikhs, of whom he took a considerable body into pay, and with them retired before the Afghans into the northern hills. Being now fully committed with the Duranis, his mind, fertile in resources, sought the means of succour and relief in a quarter, which would not readily have occurred to another. He applied to the Mahrattas, whose reputation for enterprise and daring adventure was then high, and whose chiefs were at the time encamped near Delhi. He stipulated for the payment of a daily sum for their aid, and pointed out the rich harvest of spoil that was within their reach. The expedition was entered upon with alacrity, and Mulhar Rao Holkar, with some other chiefs of that nation, marched immediately for the Punjab, where they were joined, on passing the Sutluj, by Adena Beg, with a swarm of Sikh plunderers, and the whole advanced rapidly on Lahore. Prince Timur and Juhan Khan were unable to stem this torrent of invasion, and retired precipitately to the Indus. Their retreat was harassed by frequent attacks, and most of their baggage taken. The Mahrattas then overran the whole country; their main body returned to Delhi, but a detachment of this nation was left in the occupation of Lahore.

Adena Beg Khan did not long survive this event. He died in 1758, having latterly, and indeed for a very long time, played a very conspicuous part in the diplomacy of the Punjab and Hindustan. His address, experience, and extensive knowledge recommended him early to the notice of the viceroys who in succession ruled Lahore; under them he rose through the gradations of office, until his services were at last recompensed by the delegated administration of a troublesome but very fertile region. He was a master of the arts and shifts of Indian diplomacy. The Sikhs he amused, and secured immunity from their depredations, by occasionally paying for their services, and he would even buy their forbearance when too weak to coerce them. He left no issue or successor to perpetuate his name and authority, but his memory lives in the Punjab, and he is respected even by the Sikhs as the last of the Mogul rulers in their country.

The Mahrattas were now the ruling power of Hindustan; their forces traversed the country, from the Deccan to the Indus and Himalayas, and no one ventured to take the field against them. The Musulman subahdars, who had asserted independence, in the decadence of the Mogul empire, trembled for their principalities, and seemed to have no alternative but submission, and the payment of chout (tribute) to this upstart Hindu sovereignty, or absolute extinction. In this state of things, the re-appearance of the Abdali, Ahmed Shah, east of the Indus, was hailed by a large party in Hindustan, as a welcome succour. Shuja-ud-Doula, in Oude, the celebrated Nujeeb-ud-Doula, who governed Delhi and the Northern Doab, the Rohilla chiefs, and all the Mahomedan families settled in the Doab, or west of the Jumna, prepared to range themselves under the standard of the Shah, and to fight the great battle for their faith and independence under his leading. The Mahratta detachment retired before the Shah from Lahore to Delhi, pillaging and laying waste the country as they went. The fertile plains of Sirhind consequently exhibited an appearance of desolation, that induced the Abdali, as well for the convenience of obtaining supplies, as to unite with the Mahomedan chiefs of Hindustan, to cross the Jumna at Boorea into the Doab. Here he fell in with and overpowered a Mahratta detachment under Duttajee Sindhea, who was slain, and Mulhar Rao Holkar was overtaken soon after by two Afghan generals, who routed his troops, and had nearly taken the chief himself by surprise. When the rainy season approached, the Abdali cantoned his army in the Doab between Sekundra and Anoopshuhur, the country round Delhi, and to the west of the Jumna, having been completely ravaged and laid waste by the Mahrattas.

The court of Poona, on being apprized of the arrival of the Shah, and of the defeat of Duttajee Sindhea and Mulhar Rao Holkar, prepared for a great effort to maintain their supremacy in Hindustan. The retainers of the state were called out, and an immense army advanced towards Delhi, under the command of Sudasheo Rao Bhao, commonly called the Bhao, with whom went Wiswas Rao, the Peshwa's eldest son, and the heads of all the principal Mahratta families. On the march, the chiefs in advance fell in and swelled the train, and the whole reached Delhi, pillaging without remorse as they went, and encountering nowhere any opposition.

The Jumna, which divided the two armies, was still unfordable, and the Bhao, after a short halt at Delhi, moved northward to Kurnal, where his army was occupied for a few days in the siege of Koonjpura, the possession of a Patan family, on the west bank of the Jumna. The place was taken by storm, after an obstinate resistance by the head of the family, Nijabut Khan, who was slain in the last assault. The Mahratta army then moved back on Paniput, and allowed the Shah to ford the Jumna with all his cavalry, on the 23rd of October. The Bhao judged himself to be unequal to cope with the Shah in the open field; he accordingly threw up intrenchments and took up a position about the town of Paniput, and there waited the attack of the enemy. The Abdali, strengthened by the junction of the confederate forces of Oude, Rohilkhund, and of all the Mahomedan chiefs of Upper Hindustan, surrounded the Mahrattas, and aimed to cut off the Bhao's supplies. For three months, the two armies lay close to each other, occupied in skirmishes and partial actions, and the Shah maintained his blockade. At the end of this time, want began to be felt in the Bhao's lines, and the distress from this cause increased to such a degree as to compel the Bhao to risk an action. On the 7th of January, 1761, he led his army out of their intrenched position at daybreak, and prepared for the final struggle. The Mahrattas were entirely defeated, and both Wiswas Rao and the Bhao were slain in the action, with many other principal Mahratta chiefs. There have been few battles attended with greater carnage than history assigns to this. The lowest computation of the loss sustained by the Mahrattas fixes the number engaged at 200,000, of whom more than half were slain in the action or pursuit: and, considering how far from their own country they fought, and that the intermediate tract was mostly hostile, our wonder at the loss will be lessened. But the moral effect on the Mahratta nation was greater even than the actual loss. Their entire force had been put forth for the struggle, and defeat was for the moment felt as the annihilation of their ambitious hopes, and the destruction of their power.

The Abdali remained for a few days after this important victory in the city of Delhi, regulating the affairs of Hindustan. He then returned through the Punjab to Cabul, appointing Khaja Obyd and Zyn Khan to be his governors in Lahore and Sirhind, which he designed permanently to annex to his own dominions.

AHMED SHAH made no stay in the Punjab, and troubled himself little with the disorders that prevailed in its internal administration. The governor he left at Lahore was little better than the military commandant of an out-post, collecting revenues and levying contributions as he could, for the support of his detachment, and in aid of the general resources of the Shah. The imperfect hold thus retained of this territory, and the weakness of the detachment left with the Afghan governor, Khaja Obyd, were highly favourable to the Sikhs, who throve upon the disorder which prevailed; and, in the neglect with which they were treated, secured strongholds and fastnesses in different parts of the country, and added greatly to their power and resources. Amongst others, the ancestors of Runjeet Singh, the late ruler of the Punjab, appeared early in the field as leaders of enterprise, and acquired a reputation that was daily on the increase. The family boasts of no antiquity; the first of whom any traditional recollection is preserved was a petty zemindar, named Desoo, a Jat, of the Sansee tribe, who resided in a village of the district of Manja, called Sookur-chuk. His patrimony was confined to three ploughs and a well, and little is known of him, except that he was the father of Nodh Singh, whose son, Churut Singh, founded the fortunes of the family, by establishing a Sirdaree, or chieftainship, which his descendants, Muha Singh and Runjeet, improved into the sovereignty over a wide and fertile territory.

zemindar of Mejithia, who was already initiated in the rites of that faith, and the pahal was proposed as the condition of the nuptials. Nodh Singh yielded; and, after his marriage, gave up his father's plough, and purchasing, or otherwise procuring, a horse, joined the association headed by Kapoor Singh, of Gujrat, which bore the title of Fyzullapurea.

Nodh Singh is stated to have died in 1750; when Churut Singh, following his father's courses, but disdaining to serve in a subordinate capacity, associated with himself his brothers-in-law Dul Singh and Jodh Singh, and, with their help, raised some followers, whom he maintained and kept together by successful predatory enterprises. His wife was of Gujuraolee, a village lying not far north of Lahore, and, through the influence of her family, he obtained leave to erect in its vicinity a small gurhi, or mud fort, to serve as a place of safe custody for his plunder, and of retreat for his family and followers. The post was convenient, from its vicinity to Lahore, as a rallying point for other Sikh associations; and in 1762, it attracted the attention of Khaja Obyd, who marched with a force to raze it and eject Churut Singh from the neighbourhood. The Sikhs, however, attached importance to the post, and a large body tendered their aid for its defence. When the governor approached Gujuraolee, they threw a select body into the gurhi, and hovering about, watched his camp. Khaja Obyd had entertained for the enterprise a number of Sikh troops, who opened a clandestine correspondence with their brethren, and ultimately deserted in a body to them. The governor's other troops immediately took a panic and dispersed, and Khaja Obyd himself had barely time to mount a fleet horse and escape, when the Sikhs broke into his camp and plundered his baggage.

After this defeat, the Afghan governor dared scarcely to shew himself beyond the walls of Lahore, and the Sikh dul, or assembly of chiefs and followers, was publicly held at Amritsur, where the bathings and other ceremonies of the Dewali being performed, it was resolved to invest Jundeala, a place held by Nerunjuni Guru, a Hindu, who had made submission and taken service with Ahmed Shah, and hence had incurred the vengeance of the votaries of Guru Govind.

The report of these events roused the attention of Ahmed Shah, who, in November 1762, again appeared on the Indus. From thence he made, with a select detachment, one of those long and rapid marches, for which he was celebrated, in the hope of surprising the Sikhs, who had invested, and were still employed in the siege of, Jundehala. They obtained, however, a few hours' notice of his approach, and, breaking up their camp, dispersed in different directions, most of them flying beyond the Sutluj. The Shah rejoined his main body at Lahore, and ordered his governor of Sirhind to watch the Sikhs, and call out the several Musulman sirdars and jagirdars, with their contingents, to operate against them. The Shah was informed by express, soon after this, that the main body of the Sikhs was at Kos Ruheera, on the south bank of the Sutluj (whose course from Ferozepore is from east to west), and that Zyn Khan, with the Baraich and Muler Kotila Musulmans, was watching their movements. The Shah immediately prepared a strong detachment of cavalry, provisioned for three days; and, leaving Lahore as secretly as possible, led them himself against the enemy. On the evening of the second day, he crossed the Sutluj, and made a halt of a few hours only at Lodiana. By sunrise on the following morning, he joined Zyn Khan, and found him already engaged with the Sikhs, for the latter, trusting to their great numerical superiority, had thought to overpower the Sirhind governor, and attacked him in his camp. The appearance of the high sheep-skin caps of the Shah's body-guard and northern troops gave an immediate turn to the battle, and the Sikhs were broken and fled. The pursuit was continued west as far as Hureana-Burnala, and the slaughter was great.* This disaster is characterized

* It has been estimated at from 25,000 to 30,000 men; but Captain Murray states he was assured by an old Musulman of Muler Kotila, who was in the action, that the entire killed and wounded of the Sikhs in this battle did not exceed 12,000. The want of muster-rolls and the irregular formation of Indian armies, in Sikh tradition as the ghulu-ghara, or bloody carnage. Ala Singh, of Puteala, chief of the Phool family, was made prisoner at Burnala, and carried by the Shah to Lahore, where, at the intercession of Shah Wulee Khan, the minister, he was released, upon an engagement to pay tribute, and his manly conduct and demeanour having secured him the Shah's favour, he was honoured with the title of raja, and dismissed with a rich dress of state.

The Shah, in irritation against the sect for the trouble they had given him, not less than from bigoted zeal against all idolaters and infidels, signalized his march through Amritsur by the demolition of the Sikh temple of Harmandur and of the sacred tulao, or tank. The first was blown up with gunpowder, and the reservoir, besides being defaced and filled up, as far as materials and time permitted, was polluted with the blood and entrails of cows and bullocks, a sacrilege even greater in the eyes of the schismatic disciple of Guru Govind than of the orthodox Braminical Hindu.*

The Shah's attention was now turned towards Cashmere, where his governor, Sookh Jewun, had for nine years conducted the administration without remitting any portion of the revenues to the royal treasury. The co-operation of Runjeet Deo, Raja of Jum-moo, having been secured, with some difficulty, a strong detachment was sent from Lahore, under the command of Noor-ud-deen, and the raja conducted it across the Pir Panjal mountains into the valley, which submitted after a slight resistance. Sookh Jewun, being made prisoner, was punished with the loss of his eyes. Ahmed Shah, having made these arrangements to secure his territory east of the Indus, returned to Cabul at the end of the year 1762. He left

* Pyramids were erected of the heads of slaughtered Sikhs, and Forster (Travels, vol. i. p. 279) relates that Ahmed Shah caused the walls of those mosques, which had been polluted by the Sikhs, to be washed with their blood, to remove the contamination and expiate the insult.

Kabuli Mul, a Hindu, as his governor of Lahore.

No sooner had the Abdali departed, than the Sikhs, exasperated at the indignities offered to their faith, re-appeared in the field. A Gurumata, or council of the sect, was held publicly at Amritsur, and a large body of them marched thence to Kasoor, which was taken and sacked, and yielded a considerable booty. Elated with this success, they collected a larger force, and determined on the attack of Sirhind. They appeared before the place with 40,000 men, who encamped in two divisions, to the east and west of the town. In December, 1763, the governor, Zyn Khan, moved out to risk an action with the Sikhs. The forces joined battle at Pir Zyn Munayra, a village about seven miles east of Sirhind, when fortune favoured the Sikhs, and the Musulman leaders were slain. The town of Sirhind was then carried, and most of the buildings were razed to the ground, the Sikh animosity against the place being excited by the recollection that the wife and infant son of Guru Govind had there been inhumanly put to death.

Not a house was left standing, and it is even to this day deemed a meritorious act by a Sikh, to pull down three bricks from any standing wall of Sirhind, and convey them to the Sutluj or Jumna, to be cast there into the river.

The audacity of this enterprise recalled Ahmed Shah to Lahore, and he re-appeared there in January, 1764, being his seventh invasion of Hindustan. His arrival was the signal for the Sikhs to disperse and seek refuge in the deserts west and south of Puteala and Naba. Raja Ala Singh, of the former place, had obtained the ruins of Sirhind from the Joomla chief, Bhae Boodha Singh, to whom the town had been assigned by unanimous vote of the chiefs who made the capture, the raja giving him a few productive villages in exchange. By the influence of the minister, Shah Wali Khan, he obtained from the Shah a confirmation of his tenure. The disorders which prevailed were matter of deep regret to the Abdali, but the means or time was wanting for their effectual cure, and he retraced his steps to Cabul, without having done any thing for the punishment or suppression of the Sikhs. He was no sooner gone, than they collected again, and ventured to attack Lahore. Kabuli Mul was compelled to fly, and the city was parcelled out by the captors in three divisions, which were assigned respectively to Lena Singh, Goojur Singh, and Sobha. Jasa Singh (kalal, or mace-bearer), one of their most celebrated leaders, took possession of the subah of Lahore, and coined rupees, with the legend "coined by the grace of Khalsaji, in the country of Ahmed, conquered by Jasa Singh Kalal." Ahmed Shah returned to punish this outrage, and advanced as far as the Sutluj, the Sikhs flying before him to the deserts south of the Ingraon, and no enemy appearing on whom he could wreak his vengeance. On his arrival at the Sutluj, Umur Singh,* the grandson of Raja Ala Singh,

* Umur Singh, of Puteala, was the son of Surdol Singh, who survived his father, Ala Singh, two or three years, according to Khooshwuqt Rae. When Umur Singh waited on Ahmed Shah, he was ordered to shave his head and beard before entering the royal presence. By a nuzurana (or present) of a lakh of rupees, he purchased permission to appear bearded and unshorn. Khooshwuqt Rae (for many years the agent then recently deceased, waited upon him, and received investiture with the title of Maha-Raja-Rajugan-Muhindur Bahadur, which title is now borne by the head of the Puteala family. In the midst of these operations, a dusta, or body of 12,000 of the Shah's army, suddenly quitted his camp without orders, and marched back to Cabul. The Shah followed, to reclaim or punish them ; but his retreat was harassed by parties of Sikhs, who plundered much of his baggage, and hung on his flanks and rear until he had passed the Chenab.

The Shah having thus quitted the field, the Sikhs remained undisputed masters of the Punjab, and spreading over the country, occupied it as a permanent inheritance, each sirdar, according to his strength, seizing what fell in his way, and acknowledging no superior, nor submitting to the control of anybody, or to any constituted authority whatsoever. Their proceedings were unmolested by any further interference from the west, where Ahmed Shah continued to reign until his death, in 1773, from a cancer in his face. His son and successor Timur enjoyed his throne in peace for twenty years, and made no attempt to recover Lahore and the Punjab. These, with the province of Sirhind, and the country east as far as the Jumna, fell into the possession of the chiefs and associations who had hitherto subsisted on plunder, and were for the most part of low origin, and wholly deficient in education and useful knowledge.

The sirdars or chiefs of the Sikh nation had been followed into the field by relations, friends, and volunteers, and not ordinarily by hired retainers. Most of these looked upon themselves as partners and associates in each enterprise, and regarded the lands now acquired as a common property, in which each was to have his share, according to the degree in which he might have contributed to the acquisition. The associations were called misuls, implying that they were confederacies of equals, under chiefs of their own selection.

The chief was to lead in war, and act as arbiter in peace; he was respected and treated with deference by the inferior sirdars, but these owned no obligation to obey, beyond what they might consider to be for their own reciprocal benefit, or for the well-being of the misul. The confederacies had each their distinguishing title, and at this period there are twelve principal misuls enumerated, which together could bring into the field about 70,000 horse. The following is a recapitulation of them.

of Horse.

1st. The Bhangee Misul, at the head of which were the chiefs, Hari Singh, Jhunda Singh, and Ghunda Singh, originally three Jat cultivators of the Doab. The misul derived its name from the extraordinary addiction of its members to the use of bhang, an intoxicating smoking material, prepared from the leaves of the hemp plant. Its possessions are now incorporated in the Lahore dominions 10,000

2nd. The Ramgurhea Misul, taking its name from a village east of Lahore, of which the chief, Jassa Singh, was originally a thoka, or carpenter. Its possessions were also incorporated in Runjeet Singh's dominions 3,000

3rd. The Ghunneya Misul, headed by Jy

Singh, a Jat of Ghunnee, which lies also east of Lahore. Its possessions were likewise seized by Runjeet Singh 8,000

4th. The Nukeea Misul, deriving its name from Nukee, a tract of country lying south-west of Lahore, and bordering on Multan. It had several leaders, all Jat cultivators, of low extraction. Its possessions have been seized, and it no longer exists as a separate body . . . 2,000

5th. The Aloowala Misul, headed then by Jasa Singh, kalal, or mace-bearer, who rose to great eminence amongst the Sikhs, and by his followers was honoured with the title of Badshah. His possessions lay on both sides of the Sutluj, and the present chief, a descendant of Jasa Singh, holds those to the east, under British protection. He was a grandee of the court of Runjeet Singh, treated with distinction, but subject to continual exactions, on account of his Punjab territory 3,000

6th. The Duleeala Misul, headed by Tara Singh Ghyba, a shepherd of Dulee, a village on the Ravi, east of Lahore, who received the nickname of Ghyba, from his ingenious devices for conveying goats and lambs across the torrents to feed. Tara Singh's possessions were incorporated in Runjeet Singh's dominions, but the Roopur, and some other sirdars of the misul, having possessions east of the Sutluj, are under British protection 7,500

7th. The Nishan-wala Misul, headed by Sungut Singh and Mohur Singh, the standard-

bearers of the Dul, or assembled Sikh army, whence the name was derived. The families of both chiefs are extinct, and Umbala, one of its possessions, lapsed, in consequence, to the British. Shahabad, belonging to subordinate chiefs, is under protection 12,000

8th. The Fyzullapurea Misul, sometimes styled Singhpurea, headed by Kupoor Singh and Khooshal Singh, of Fyzullapur, a village near Amritsur, the Mahomedan name of which the Sikhs changed to Singhpur. The chiefs were Jat zemindars; Kupoor Singh was styled Nuwab by his followers; their possessions, west of the Sutluj, have been seized, but those to the east are still held by their descendants, under British protection 2,500

9th. The Krora-Singhea Misul, headed by Krora Singh, and afterwards by Bhugael Singh, both Jats. Krora Singh left no heir. Bhugael Singh's possessions in the Punjab have been absorbed, but his widow holds Chiloundi, and twenty-two other villages east of the Sutluj, under British protection. Chiche-rouli, belonging to a subordinate chief of the misul, is also under protection, and Bhudawur has lapsed 12,000

10th. The Shuheed and Nihung Misul, headed by Kurum Singh and Goor Buksh Singh. The name, which signifies 'Martyrs,' was acquired by the first chiefs, ancestors of those named, who were beheaded by the Mahomedans at Dunduma, west of Puteala. Their possessions lie east of the Sutluj, and are protected .. 2,000

11th. The Phoolkea and Bhykea Misul, headed by Raja Ala Singh, and afterwards by Raja Umur Singh, his grandson, of Puteala. Phool was the Jat progenitor of the Puteala, Naba, Jeend, and Kythul chiefs, all of whom are under British protection 5,000

12th. The Sookur-Chukea Misul, headed by Churut Singh, ancestor of Runjeet Singh, whose progenitors were Jat zemindars of Sookur-Chuk 2,500

In the above list, the misul of Churut Singh holds the last place, and was formed, probably, after the successful defence of Gujraolee and the defeat of Khaja Obyd had raised the reputation of, and given a new distinction to, that chief. Every misul acted independently, or in concert, as necessity or inclination suggested, but there was generally an assembly of the chiefs, called the Surhut Khalsa, held twice a year, at Amritsur, during the Bysakhi and Dewali festivals, which occur in April and October. On these occasions, after bathing in the sacred reservoir, they generally held a Gurumata, or special council, where expeditions of importance, or any matters of more than ordinary moment, were submitted to their united wisdom. If the joint forces of several misuls took the field upon any predatory enterprise, or to collect rakha (black-mail), the army assumed the denomination of a dul of the khalsaji.

When the misuls acquired their territorial possessions, it became the first duty of the chiefs to partition out the lands, towns, and villages amongst those who considered themselves as having made the conquest, shamil, or in common. Every surkunda, or leader of the smallest party of horse that fought under the standard of the misul, demanded his share, in proportion to the degree in which he had contributed to the acquisition; and, as they received no pay from the chief, and he had no other recompense to offer for their services, there was no resource but to adopt this mode of satisfying them. The sirdaree, or chief's portion, being first divided off, the remainder was separated into puttees, or parcels for each surkunda, and these were again subdivided and parcelled out to inferior leaders, according to the number of horse they brought into the field. Each took his portion as a co-sharer, and held it in absolute independence.

It was impossible that this state of things should subsist long in the Punjab, any more than it had done in England, France, and other countries of Europe, when they similarly fell a prey to hordes of associated warriors, who acknowledged no systematic general authority or government. When the link of a common enemy and common danger was removed, and the chiefs were converted from needy adventurers to lords of domains, discords and mutual plunderings commenced, as temper, ambition, or avarice excited to contention. Cause of quarrel was never wanting in the confusion of the coparcenary system. The disputes and divisions, which subsisted in each lordship, favoured the designs of the aspiring from without, whose aid being solicited by one of the parties, an opening was frequently found to eject both. In cases of frontier disputes, or of injury, or wrong of any kind sustained or fancied, the chief would call upon his kindred and retainers to furnish him the means of redress, and they would feel bound by a sense of honour not to fail, when the chara, or gathering, was demanded in such a cause ; but in a matter of internal strife within the misul, every one would be free to choose his own side, and either party would deem it fair to fortify itself with any aid it could command from without. Upon occasions of gathering, it became customary for the chief, or person demanding it, to pay a rupee per kathee, or saddle ; in other respects, the service was gratuitous, and plunder was the reward expected by those who joined either standard. The past life and habits of the Sikhs precluded any scruples on their part as to the conduct or character of their associates. The most daring culprits found ready admission into their ranks, and it was a point of honour to deliver no one upon demand of a neighbour, whatever might be the crime laid to his charge. Hence arose the practice of gaha, or self-redress, by individuals, no less than by chiefs ; and every owner of a village was compelled to surround his possession with a wall and ditch ; while in towns, or places held in joint property, the houses of the coparcenary, and of all who were exposed to the appetite or revengeful passions of others, were built as towers or keeps, and a fort in joint tenancy would ordinarily be divided by an inner retrenchment, as a protection against treachery from the fellow-occupant.

The tenure that has been described above is the Puteedari, that of every associate in the misul of less rank than a sirdar, down even to the single horseman, who equipped and mounted himself: all these regulated entirely the management of their putee, fining, confining, or even further illtreating, according to their pleasure, any zemindar, or working ryot of their allotment. His complaint could not be listened to or redressed by any superior; but in case of quarrel with an equal, reference would be made to the surkunda, and if his decision failed to give satisfaction, an appeal might be made to the general sirdar. The more ordinary mode, however, was to collect friends and relations, and seek a prompt self-redress. It was not legitimate for a puteedar to sell his tenure to a stranger, but he might mortgage it to satisfy any present want, and at his demise might settle, by will, to which of his male relations it should go. Reciprocal aid, for mutual protection and defence, was the relation in which a putedar stood in other respects to the sirdar, and the only condition of his tenure.

Besides the putedari, however, there were three other tenures created, arising out of the circumstances in which different chiefs found themselves, from the manner of their association with those who composed their misul. These were the Misuldari, the Tabadari, and the Jagurdari.

Bodies of inferior strength, or petty chiefs, with their followers, attached themselves sometimes to a misul, without subscribing to any conditions of association or dependence. The allotments of land assigned to such would be considered as the free reward of their co-operation, and would be held in no sort of dependence; they were called Misuldari. If dissatisfied with his chief, a misuldar might transfer himself with his possessions to another, under whose protection or countenance he might prefer to continue.

A tabadar was, on the other hand, a retainer, as the word is understood in Europe; one completely subservient; the lands, which were his reward, were liable to forfeiture for any act of disobedience or rebellion, and, at the caprice of the sirdar, might be resumed upon any occasion of displeasure.

The third class of tenures, or jagirs, were given to needy relations, dependants, and entertained soldiers who deserved well, and the holders were liable to be called upon for their personal services at all times, with their quotas or contingents, equipped and mounted at their own charge, according to the extent of the grant. These were even further under the power of the sirdar than the tabadari grants. Both were hereditary only according to his pleasure, the lands of them formed part of the allotment set apart for the sirdari, and the misul, or association, had, of course, nothing to say in such assignments.

The religious and charitable appropriations and grants, viz. those made to Sikh gurus, soodees, and baidees, or to endowments for temples, and for charitable distributions of alms, and sometimes even to Musulman pirzadas, need no description, for they have nothing to distinguish them from what are found all over India.

The above explanation has been necessary to give some idea of the state of things, which resulted from the two provinces of Lahore and Sirhind being left to be occupied by the Sikhs, when finally abandoned by the Afghans, as they had previously been by the Mogul and Delhi officers. The European reader will at once be struck by the similarity between the condition of things above described, and the relations which have been handed down to us of what occurred in England, when the Saxons similarly spread over and occupied that country; and when Clovis and the Franks seized the fairest portion of Gaul. The arrangements for government were the very rudest that the most ignorant tribes ever devised: and, though the ideologist may find something attractive in contemplating such attempts to realize in practice the dream of universal independence and equality of condition between individuals, he must, indeed, be a bold speculator in politics, who would assume that any class could find happiness, contentment, or rest, in a country ruled by seventy thousand sovereigns, as were the unfortunate provinces of Lahore and Sirhind, when the Sikhs assumed dominion over them.

CHAPTER IX.

THE Punjab henceforward became the theatre of the squabbles and petty feuds which arose amongst the chiefs thus left in possession, and as these ordinarily were of little interest and less variety, those only deserve relation, which contributed to produce the present condition of the state; in other words, those in which the ancestors of Runjeet Singh, or himself, bore a part.

The hill Raja of Jummoo, Runjeet Deo, had a misunderstanding with his eldest son Brij-Raj, and desired to set aside his pretensions to the succession in favour of the youngest, Meean Dulel Singh. In order to secure his hereditary rights, Brij-Raj broke into rebellion, and applied to Churut Singh, offering a large yearly tribute, on condition of his aiding to depose his father. Churut

Singh having an old enmity against Runjeet Deo, closed with the offer, and strengthening himself by association with Jy Singh, of the Ghunea Misul, their united force marched into the hills and encamped at Oodhachur, on the bank of the Busuntur river. The Raja, having received timely notice of the designs of the heir-apparent, had made corresponding preparations for resistance. The defence of the capital he reserved to himself, but collected a force to oppose the invasion, composed of auxiliaries from Chumba, Noorpur, Busehur, and Kangra, in the hills, to which were added, besides a party of his own troops, the confederated forces of the Bhangee Misul, under Jhunda Singh, whom he induced to lend his services in the extremity. The two armies lay encamped on opposite sides of the Busuntur, and in a partial skirmish between the Sikh auxiliaries, Churut Singh was killed by the bursting of his own matchlock.*

* Khooshwuqt Rae says this event happened at Oodhoo-Chuk, on the Busuntur, after the two armies had been for six months encamped on opposite sides of the stream,

He was 45 years of age, and had risen from a common Dharwee, or highwayman, to be sirdar of a separate misul, with a territory computed to yield about three lakhs of rupees. He left a widow, Desan by name, with two sons and a daughter, called respectively Maha Singh, Suhuj Singh, and Raj Koonwur. The eldest son, Maha Singh, then ten years of age, succeeded to the sirdaree; but the widow and Jy Singh Ghunee assumed the immediate direction of affairs. It was determined by them to assassinate Jhunda Singh Bhangee, who was the main stay of the Jummoo Raja's party, and the avowed enemy of both the Sukur-Chukea and Ghunee misuls. A sweeper was tempted by a large bribe to undertake this hazardous enterprise, and he succeeded in effecting his purpose by firing at and mortally wounding the Bhangee chief, as he was walking unattended through the Jummoo camp. The Sukur-Chukea and Ghunee Sikhs, being satisfied with the revenge thus taken, withdrew soon after from the enterprise in which they had engaged. The Bhangee troops had similarly left the opposite camp on the death of their chief. Thus Brij-Raj Deo was left alone to settle with his father his rights of inheritance to the Raj: before the departure, however, of Maha Singh, he went through the ceremony of an exchange of turbands (dustarbudlee) with Brij-Raj, which bound him to brotherhood for life. These events occurred in 1774.*

* Captain (Sir C.) Wade gives 1771 as the date of Churut Singh's death, and states it to have occurred in a general action with the Bhangee Sikhs, at Suhawara, near Jussar Dodeh, in the Reechna Doab. He concurs in assigning the bursting of his matchlock as the cause of Churut Singh's death, but says that Jhunda Singh was shot by a man of his own party in the course of the action. The discrepancy, except that of date, is not very material; but it is singular that such an event should be so differently reported to the two officers. Captain Murray is deemed the superior authority, and his version has therefore been adhered to. In like manner, Captain Wade differs from Captain Murray in the date assigned to the birth of Maha Singh. Captain Wade places it in 1757. Captain Murray fixes it in 1764.

Singh's recently formed misul, mistrusting the youth of Maha Singh, or dissatisfied with the regent widow, aimed now to shake off their dependence. Of these, one Dhurum Singh was the first to commit himself by an overt act of rebellion. He relied on the succour and countenance of Gunda Singh, Jhunda Singh's successor in the sirdaree of the Bhangee Misul, but was deceived in his expectations, and suffered forfeiture of his lands for contumacy, before any aid could come to his relief.* The rest were deterred by this example, and the moment appearing favourable, the nuptials of Maha Singh were celebrated, in 1776, with the daughter of Gujput Singh, of Jeend, to whom he had previously been betrothed. Jy Singh and a large armed force of Sukur-Chukea and Ghunnee Sikhs crossed the Sutluj, with the Barat, to Budrookh, where the young chief was met by his bride; and a large concourse of sirdars of the nation did honour to the ceremony, it being with them obligatory to give attendance on such occasions, and the omission being looked upon as a slight, and a wide deviation from propriety.

Maha Singh is next heard of as the associate of Jy Singh in an enterprise for the capture of Rusul-Nugur, now called Ram-Nugur by the Sikhs, situated on the east bank of the Chenab, and held by a Jat Musulman, named Pir Mahomed, who was at the head of the ancient tribe of Chutta, styled sometimes Munchurea, from a considerable town in their occupation, and many of whom have embraced the religion of the Koran. The pretext for this attack was, that the tribe had given up to the Bhangee Misul a large piece of ordnance, left behind by the Abdali Shah, and placed with them in deposit, from inability to cross it over the Chenab. This gun was of much celebrity, and is now known as the Bhangee Top : * it was claimed for the Khalsa, or Sikh nation at large, to be appropriated by an assembly of chiefs. Rusul-Nugur was besieged and blockaded for four months, and the Bhangee Sikhs, being employed at the time in plundering or levying tribute in the Multan and Bahawulpur districts, neglected to afford succour or relief. The place consequently fell to Maha Singh, who acquired great reputation by this early feat of arms, so that many independent sirdars, who had hitherto attached themselves to the Bhangee Misul, transferred their services to him, and preferred to follow his leading in war, and to live under his protection.

* Khooshwuqt Rae says the Bhangee Top had been taken by Churut Singh from Lena Singh, but the carriage breaking down in the attempt to carry it to Gujraolee, it was left in deposit with the zemindars of

Two years after this event, on the 2nd November, 1780, a son was born to Maha Singh, by his wife, of the Jeend family, and named Runjeet Singh. The child was attacked by the small-pox at a very early age, and, the disease taking an unfavourable turn, his life was endangered; whereupon the father, according to Asiatic custom, made large donations to the poor in charity, fed multitudes of Bramins and holy men, to secure their prayers, and sent gifts to the sacred temples at Kangra and Juwala-Mookhee. The boy recovered, but with the loss of one of his eyes, whence he was termed Kana, or 'the one-eyed;' and his face was marked with the disease.

Maha Singh was engaged at this period in settling the territory he had inherited or acquired, and in extending his influence and connections. The Bhangees lost their principal sirdars; and, having aimed to establish themselves in Multan, brought down on themselves an Afghan army, which retook the city from them, and further ejected them from Bahawulpur and Munkera. The consequence was, that the power of the misul was effectually broken, and the rising fortune and reputation of Maha Singh enabled him to extend his relations and strengthen himself from its ruin. He was cautious, however, of engaging in any direct hostility with his Sikh brethren, well knowing that, to follow such means of aggrandizement, would breed ill-will, and lead probably to a confederacy for his destruction. Again, the Afghan power was still too formidable and too united for him to hope to aggrandize himself at the expense of that nation. His restless spirit was, however, not long in finding a quarter in which to pursue his schemes.

Raja Runjeet Deo of Jummoo was dead, and his son, Brij-Raj Deo, having succeeded to that raj, proved unworthy and debauched, so that discontent prevailed in the principality, and afforded an opening for interference. Maha Singh, tempted by this state of things, resolved to exact tribute and enforce fealty from his turband brother; he accordingly moved with a force into the hills, and Brij-Raj, being in no condition for resistance, fled to the Trikota-Devi mountain, a three-peaked eminence, where is an Usthan, or temple of Bishun-Devi, in which the Hindu devotee presents an offering of coco-nuts. The town of Jummoo was at this period very prosperous and rich, for, in consequence of the distractions of the Punjab, many of the wealthy merchants had been induced to seek an asylum, or to establish a branch-firm within the hills beyond their influence.* Jummoo was well situated for this purpose, while under Runjeet Deo the resort of this class of persons to his dominions was encouraged, and they lived in ease and security. Maha Singh and his Sikhs sacked the town, and ravaged the whole territory of Jummoo, and he is reported to have brought away a large spoil, including much specie and valuables of all kinds.†

* Khooshwuqt Rae names several families which had found refuge in Jummoo, during the troubles of the Punjab. Amongst others, Mulika Zumani, a Delhi queen, and one of the widows of Meer Munoo. Hari Singh, the son, with other members of the family of Raja Kaonra Mul, was also living there in splendour; and Dilput Rae, the son of Lukhput Rae, had likewise settled there, with the remains of several other families of the nobles of the Delhi, or vice-regal courts. Runjeet Deo treated all these refugees with much distinction, and particularly enjoined his son to continue to them the same courtesy. Brij-Raj, however, was no sooner seated on the gudi, than he made them the objects of his extortion. From Hari Singh he is said to have obtained 50 lakhs of rupees.

† Khooshwuqt Rae states the plunder obtained by Maha Singh, from Jummoo, at two crores of rupees; but this seems much exaggerated. He also states that Brij-

By this conduct Maha Singh, though he enriched himself, raised also many enemies. The Bhangee Sikhs, who had long maintained a connection with Jummoo, were highly irritated, and, what was even of more consequence to Maha Singh's rising fortunes, the displeasure and jealousy of his old mentor and guardian, Jy Singh, of Ghunee, was incurred. This chief, of a haughty imperious temper, was now in the zenith of his power. Maha Singh, on his return from the hills, proceeded with his booty to Amritsur, with the double purpose of paying his respects to Jy Singh, and performing his ablutions in the holy reservoir. The old chief received him with such coolness and displeasure, that Maha Singh, assuming the demeanour of an inferior, approached with a tray of sweetmeats in his hand, and begged to be made acquainted with the cause of offence, professing his sense of filial obligation and attachment to Jy Singh, and offering any atonement in his power. Jy Singh was stretched at length on his couch, and, drawing his sheet over him, called out loudly and rudely, that he desired to hear no more of the Bhugtea's (dancing boy's) pathetic conversation.* Maha Singh retired in high indignation at this reception, and determined to be revenged for the insult. He mounted his horse, and, with a few followers, made his escape secretly from Amritsur, where Jy Singh's power and influence were paramount, and returned to his home to seek the means of executing his purposes. Being too weak to enter the field against the Ghunee and Bhangee misuls alone, he cast about for associates, and determined to make a friend of Jasa Singh, sirdar of the Ramghurea Misul, who had recently been ousted from his possessions in the Punjab by a confederacy of the Aloowala and Ghunee associations, and the latter had been considerable gainers by the aggression. Agents were immediately

* According to Khooshwuqt Rae, Jy Singh ordered his people to shoot Maha Singh, and Goor Bukhsh, his son, in vain interceded to save him; he also says, that Maha Singh went off immediately from the interview, and was pursued and fired at as far as the village of Mejithia, but escaped fortunately without injury.

despatched to recall Jasa Singh, and to assure him of aid and support, if disposed to make an effort for the recovery of his lost possessions. The despoiled chief, who was living by depredations in the Doab of the Jumna and Ganges, with the wilds of Hansi and Hisar for his place of refuge, having satisfied himself of the motives of Maha Singh's offer, lost no time in returning into the Punjab, with all the force he could collect.

The combined troops of Maha Singh and Jasa Singh now appeared suddenly within a few miles of Butala, the principal town of Jy Singh's possessions, and where he had fixed his residence. Here they were joined by Sunsar Chund, Raja of Kot Kangra, in the hills, and by Umur Singh Bugreh, and some other disaffected tributaries of the Ghunee Sirdar, who had been stirred up by Maha Singh. Jy Singh was now called upon to render up the share of the Ramghurea possessions, which had been allotted to him, and, on his refusal, the invaders proceeded to occupy and ravage the country. Jy Singh made a gathering of his misul, and placing his son, Goor Bukhsh Singh, at the head of 8,000 horse, sent him to punish and expel the invaders. An action ensued, in which Goor Bukhsh exposed himself with youthful rashness, and was slain ; whereupon his followers dispersed and fled, and the victors soon after made themselves masters of Butala, when Jy Singh, being humbled, was compelled to sue for peace, which was granted to him by the young chief he had insulted, under condition that he should render up the Ramghurea lands to Jasa Singh, and the fort of Kangra, which he obtained by stratagem, to Sunsar Chund. These terms being accepted, the allies retained the town of Butala ; but towards the close of the year, Suda Koonwur, widow of Goor Bukhsh Singh, succeeded by intrigue with the inhabitants in ejecting the garrison and recovering it.

Jy Singh had set his hopes on the promise afforded by the character of Goor Bukhsh ; and though he had two other sons, Bagh Singh and Nidhan Singh, he treated them with neglect, his whole affections being engrossed by the family of his deceased son. The widow, Suda Koonwur, gained an entire ascendant over the old man, and being of an aspiring, bold spirit, she procured that a separate appanage of some villages about Sobnan and Hajipur should be set apart for the surviving sons, while she regulated every thing at Butala for the interest of herself and her only child by Goor Bukhsh, a daughter. At her suggestion, a negotiation was opened for the affiancing of the girl, whose name was Mehtab-koonwur, to Runjeet Singh, the young son of Maha Singh, whom she hoped thus to bind to a permanent reconciliation, and through his friendship and powerful support, to secure for herself the sirdaree upon her father-in-law's decease. Maha Singh assented readily to the union, and the mungnee, or betrothment, of the children was duly performed in the year 1785, and contributed further to raise Maha Singh in power and reputation; for through the friendship of the Ramghurea sirdar, and the Kangra Raja, which was permanently secured by his aid in the recovery of their lost possessions, added to the influence resulting from this close connection with the Ghunee Misul, there was no one in the Punjab, or of the Sikh nation, who could compete with him in authority, or command equal means. The result was favourable to the prosperity of the country, and the Punjab, for several years during this chief's ascendancy, enjoyed a repose and tranquillity to which it had long been a stranger.

Until 1791, Maha Singh continued to administer in peace the territory he had acquired, and to exercise his influence for the benefit of those connected with him. In that year Goojur Singh, the Sikh chief of Goojrat, died, and Saheb Singh, his son, succeeded to the sirdaree. The sister of Maha Singh had been given in marriage to Saheb Singh, by Churut Singh, but the ties of affinity had little influence in restraining ambitious views, and the desire of aggrandizement, which filled the mind of Maha Singh, was not to be so checked. He deemed the moment favourable for asserting superiority over Goojrat, and for claiming tribute. Saheb Singh evaded compliance, alleging, that his father was an adherent of the Bhangee Misul, and had never fought under the standard of the Sukur-Chukea, on whom he acknowledged no dependence. Maha Singh marched, on receiving this reply, and besieged Saheb Singh in his fort of Soohdura. The Goojratea chief applied in his distress to the Bhangee Sikhs, and Kurum Singh Dooloo came with the strength of that misul to interrupt the siege. Though not strong enough to enter the field with Maha Singh, they hovered about his camp, and put him to considerable inconvenience for supplies; a detachment of the Sukur Chukeas, however, succeeded, after a time, in beating up the quarters and plundering the camp of the Bhangees, after which the siege proceeded. Maha Singh had been three months before the place, when, in the early part of the year 1792, he became seriously ill. The siege was immediately broken up, and the chief being carried back to his principal place of residence, Goojraolee, expired there, in the twenty-seventh year of his age. He was brave, active, and prudent beyond his years, and left a high reputation amongst his nation for all the qualities of a sirdar. He shook off the trammels of his mother's guardianship at the early age of seventeen, and some time after, having detected her in an intrigue with a Bramin, put her to death with his own hand : an act of barbarous justice that does not seem to have lessened his reputation, or in any way to have affected his character injuriously, in the eyes of his contemporaries.

Maha Singh left only one son, Runjeet Singh, who was then in his twelfth year. His mother became regent, and was assisted by the minister of her husband, Lukhoo or Lukhput Singh. Suda Koonwur, the minor chief's mother-in-law, exerted also much influence in the conduct of affairs, and in the year following, viz. 1793, the demise of Jy Singh left the Ghunee Misul likewise under her direction, every thing having been prepared beforehand for the exclusion of the sons of that sirdar.

Little care was taken of the education of Runjeet Singh. The means were furnished to him of gratifying every youthful passion or desire, and his early years were passed in indulgence, and in following the sports of the field. He was never taught to read or write in any language. While still in tutelage, however, a second marriage was con-

Upon attaining the age of seventeen years, Runjeet Singh, in imitation of his father, assumed in person the conduct of affairs, and dismissed the dewan: it is further stated that, under the guidance of Dul Singh, his father's maternal uncle, who had long borne ill-will to the dewan, Lukhoo was despatched on an expedition to Kitas, where he was slain in an affray with the zemindars, not without suspicion of contrivance. His father's example gave sanction to an act of further cruelty in Runjeet Singh. The regent mother was accused of having led a life of profligate indulgence, the late dewan being not the only paramour admitted to her favours. Upon receiving evidence of this, it is said, that Runjeet Singh gave his sanction to, or at least connived at, her being put to death, and the old chief, Dul Singh, is designated as the perpetrator of the act by means of poison.* Runjeet Singh, with the advice of minated." Captain Wade assigns the year 1787 for the decease of Maha Singh, and states him to have been born in 1757, as before remarked, which are discrepancies of date with Captain Murray, for which I am unable to account; the latter is the authority followed. Khooshwugt Rae is silent in respect to the fate of Runjeet Singh's mother, but admits that the dewan was made away with, and adds that Runjeet was for some time after distrustful of the whole race of mutusudees, and would employ none.

CHAPTER X.

A.D. 1794 TO 1808.

IN the course of the years 1795, 1796, and 1797, the Punjab was twice exposed to invasion by Shah Zeman, who had recently succeeded the peaceful Timur on the throne of Cabul. The Sikhs ventured not to oppose him openly in the field, and his coming, therefore, was a source of infinite confusion, leading to a temporary abandonment of their possessions by the sirdars near his route. In 1798 the Shah advanced again, and entered Lahore without opposition; but, after a few months' stay there, finding it impossible to make any arrangements for the permanent occupation of the country, or to render the Punjab in other respects a source of advantage to himself, he retraced his steps to his hereditary dominions west of the Indus, and the Sikh sirdars returned each to the territory he had acquired, and which had been evacuated on the Shah's approach. Runjeet Singh was one of those who retired before the Shah, and on this last occasion he joined other sirdars similarly circumstanced with himself, or otherwise linked to his misul, and made an expedition across the Sutluj, where he employed the interval of the Shah's stay at Lahore in a tour for the exaction of tribute, and for the reduction to his authority of any towns or villages he could master.

Upon the retirement of the Shah, Runjeet Singh began to entertain designs for securing Lahore to himself, and his mother-in-law, Suda Koonwur, encouraged his views, and lent her aid to forward them. The city was at this time in the joint possession of Chyt Singh, Mohur Singh, and Saheb Singh. Runjeet, however, by an opportune service to Zeman Shah, obtained from that prince a grant, with permission to take possession. The Afghan had been compelled to precipitate his retreat from the Punjab, by intelligence of designs from Persia, on the side of Herat, having for their object the support of the claims of Shah Mahmud. On arriving at the Jelum, that river was found swollen with temporary rain, so that the Afghan artillery could not be crossed. Not thinking it expedient to wait on this account, Shah Zeman wrote to Runjeet Singh, to extricate and forward to him the guns left behind, holding out the hope, that his known wishes in respect to Lahore might be complied with if this duty were well performed. The politic Sikh raised eight out of the twelve guns from the bed of the river into which they had sunk, and forwarded them to the Shah, from whom he received in return the grant he desired. The remaining four guns were not raised till 1823, and are now in the arsenal at Lahore.*

Armed with this authority over the Mahomedan population of the town, and assisted by the credit and troops of Suda Koonwur, Runjeet Singh prepared an expedition against the city of Lahore. The three Sikh chiefs in possession were profligate and debauched, and neglectful of the means of securing themselves. They had few troops or retainers, and their administration was most unpopular. In order to prepare the way for the success of his scheme, Runjeet deputed Kazeer Abdur-Rahman, a native of Rusulnugur, to open an intrigue with some of the principal Musulman inhabitants. Meer Mohkum, manager for Chyt Singh, with Mahomed Ashik and Meer Shadee, were won over to assist the project, and promised, on the approach of Runjeet, to open one of the gates to him. Accordingly, he marched, accompanied by his mother-in-law, and, having been admitted without opposition, Chyt Singh and his two co-partners were compelled to accept jagirs for subsistence; and Runjeet Singh thus established his own authority, and made arrangements to secure his conquest. His successful aggression and acquisition of a place so famous excited the jealousy of all rival sirdars, and an assembly of troops for recovery of this city took place at Basim. Goolab Singh Bhangee, Saheb

* The fact of Runjeet Singh's having obtained a grant of Lahore from the Afghan sovereign is not mentioned by Captain Murray. The statement, with the circumstances under which it was alleged to be procured, is made on the authority of Captain Wade.

Singh of Goojrat, and Nujum-ud-deen of Kasoor, were the chiefs at the head of the confederacy most active in hostility to Runjeet. After a few months of debate, however, and some fruitless skirmishes, finding the young chief well prepared, their army broke up, and the city was left ever after in Runjeet's uninterrupted possession.

The Musulmans of Kasoor, a considerable town about forty miles S. E. of Lahore, incurred the just resentment of Runjeet Singh, as well by the part their chief had taken in this confederacy, as by depredations since committed by them up to the gates of the city. His next enterprise was against their possessions, and in 1801-2 Nujum-ud-deen was compelled to submit to terms, binding himself to furnish a quota of troops under his brother Kutub-ud-deen, and to become a feudatory of Runjeet. In the same year the young chief, having proceeded to bathe in the sacred reservoir of Guru Ram-Das, at Tarun-Turun, met there Sirdar Fateh Singh, of the Aloowala Misul, and, contracting a friendship with him, made an exchange of turbands.

The year 1802 was marked by the birth * of Khuruk Singh, the successor of Runjeet Singh. His mother was Raj-Koonwur, daughter of Khujan Singh of Nukee. In the same year, the fort of Cheniot, held by Jasa Singh, son of the Bhangee chief, Kurum Singh Dooloo, was besieged, and, after a short resistance, taken by Runjeet, who made to the expelled chief a trifling allowance for maintenance.†

The distracted state of the Sikh country at this time inspired some apprehensions in the British government of India, that a French force might be established in the Punjab.

* Captain Wade places this event after the decease of Dul Singh, and pending measures to occupy his jagir and fort of Aleepoor, which, according to Captain Murray, would make it in 1804. The year 1802 is, however, assigned as the date by both officers.

† Jasa Singh of Chunduniot, or Cheniot, is said to have surrendered to Runjeet Singh, upon a promise of restoration sworn on the holy Grant'h, but was nevertheless made prisoner immediately on presenting himself, and stripped of all his possessions. Runjeet Singh, being taxed with the perjury, called for the holy volumes on which he had sworn, and the wrappers being opened, some bricks in the shape of books were all that was found.

Mr. Wellesley wrote to the Governor-general, in August, 1802, that one of General Perron's officers had obtained possession of a considerable tract of country, and that "there can be no doubt of General Perron's intention to assume as large a portion of the Punjab as he may think himself able to manage, or it may be convenient to him to retain, and it is equally certain that the actual state of that country will render it an easy conquest to any thing like a regular force."*

In December, 1802, Runjeet assembled his own and Suda Koonwur's forces, and being joined by the Aloowala, the three united misuls fell suddenly on the family of Goolab Singh, the last Bhangee sirdar of note, who had been always at feud with Maha Singh when living, and was at the head of the confederacy which had attempted to recover Lahore. Goolab Singh had died in 1800, leaving a widow, named Rani Sookha, and a son, Goordut Singh, still a minor, under her guardianship. The moment was considered favourable to break for ever the power of the Bhangees. Accordingly, the widow was called upon to surrender the fort of Lohgurbh in Amritsur, to give up the great Bhangee gun, and in other respects to submit to the confederates. Feeling unequal to resist, the helpless widow evacuated Lohgurbh, and fled with her child, and the family has since sunk to indigence and obscurity.*

Pending this operation, a domestic feud occurred in Kasoor; and, Nujum-ud-deen, being assassinated, was succeeded in the sirdaree by Kutub-ud-deen, his brother. The juncture appearing favourable, Runjeet Singh moved down, with a large force of confederated Sikhs, against that territory;

* Goolab Singh Bhangee died, it is said, from excessive drinking. Lohgurbh stood a siege, and was taken by assault,—the besiegers having found entrance by a wicket gate, left open to act as an embrasure for an enormous gun. The place was taken in the midst of a storm in the month of December, and Goordut and his mother, escaping, were all night exposed to the cold and rain, but found refuge at last with Jodh Singh, head of the Rumgurhea Misul, whose fort, Ramgurbh, was not very distant. Runjeet Singh found his aunt, the sister of Maha Singh, in the fort, and sent her off in a ruf'h, or covered cart, next morning, to share the misfortunes of Rani Sookha.

but, after plundering the open country for three months, finding he could make no impression on the strongholds, which are numerous in the district, he accepted a pecuniary payment, and retired. In March of this year, Raja Sunsar Chund, of Kot Kangra, in the hills, made a descent into the plains, and plundered some villages in the territory of Suda Koonwur, that is, belonging to the Ghunee Misul. She called for the aid of her son-in-law, who marched immediately with Futeh Singh Aloowala, and soon expelled the mountaineers. The occasion was taken to invest Sujampur, which was held by the Sikh chief Boodh Singh Bhugut, from whom a sum of ready money, a large piece of ordnance, and the three districts of Buhrampoor, Dhurumkot, and Sukhalgurb were extorted.

From the Jalendra Doab, where these operations had carried him, Runjeet Singh crossed the Ravi, and returned to Lahore by a detour through Sealkot and Rusulnugur, plundering as he went. The widow of Choor-Mul was, during this march, deprived of Phugwara, which was given in an exchange to Futeh Singh Aloowala. Sunsar Chund ventured again into the plains, towards the close of the year, and seized several towns in the Jalendra, but decamped again on the march thither of Runjeet with a body of Aloowala and Ghunee confederates. In February following, the Hill Raja again appeared, and having seized Hoshyarpur and Bijwara, attempted to maintain himself there. From both, however, he was expelled by the Sikhs, and Runjeet, after this service, made a tour of exaction, in which, either as gift or tribute, he obtained considerable sums from the old Sikh chiefs, Tara Singh Ghyba, Dhurum Singh, of Amritsur, and Boodh Singh, of Fyzullapur. His conduct excited the jealousy and fears of all the sirdars, who had hitherto enjoyed independence and immunity from molestation. They saw that Runjeet aimed to reduce them to fealty and subservience; yet were they so divided and filled with jealousies, and without a head or leader, that they attempted nothing, and could devise no scheme to relieve themselves from his arbitrary exactions, and from the forfeiture and resumption with which he seemed systematically to visit the family of every chief who died. It was in this year that Dul Singh, the brother-in-law of Churut Singh, expired, when Runjeet acquired Akulgurh* and Jum-mabad by escheat, these places being held as dependencies of the Sukurchukea Misul. Dul Singh had been in disgrace some time before his death.

When Lord Wellesley, in 1803, was instructing Lord Lake respecting the campaign against the Mahrattas, he endeavoured to secure the co-operation of the Sikh chiefs. He understood then that Runjeet Singh, "the rajah of Lahore," was considered to be the principal, and to possess much influence over the whole Sikh body. His Lordship mentions that M. Perron had excited the suspicion and jealousy of the chiefs, by false and malignant statements of the views and intentions of our government with respect to the Sikhs, and he recommends Lord Lake to suggest to the Sikh chiefs the danger they will hereafter be exposed to by any opposition to the British Government, and the advantages they might derive from a connection with so powerful a state.* It appears† that Runjeet transmitted proposals to Lord Lake for the transfer of the Sikh territories south of the Sutluj, on condition of mutual defence against the respective enemies of that chief and the British nation.

The dissensions of the four sons of Timur Shah, Humayun, Mahmud, Shah Zeman, and Shah Shujah, began at this time to produce distractions in the Afghan empire, which led to the royal authority being everywhere held in contempt. Runjeet Singh was encouraged by this state of things to direct his views westward, and after a Dusera, passed in more than ordinary excess at Lahore, he determined, in the year 1804, to seek further aggrandizement by the seizure of the dependencies of that empire, east of the Indus. He accordingly crossed the Ravi in October; and, having the Aloowala chief in attendance, moved to Ramnugur on the Chenab, and thence to Jhung, held by Ahmed Khan, a chief of considerable note. The Khan made his submission, and bought off the invaders. Sahiwal and Kot Maharaja, possessions of two Balooch Musulmans, were next visited, and an acknowledgment of supremacy, with presents of horses and other gifts, saved them from ravage. As the season advanced, preparation was made to visit the neighbourhood of Multan, but the governor, Mozuffur Khan, anticipated the design, and averted the evil from his subjects and dependants by the transmission of timely and rich presents. Relations were then established with all the Musulman chiefs and families settled about the Chenab and Jelum ; and, although the amount obtained in this first visit, in the way of tribute, or by gifts, was not large, the effect of the operations of the season was beneficial to the ulterior views of the aspiring Sikh, for the chiefs, as far as the Indus, began to see to what quarter their hopes and fears must thenceforward be directed : most of them at once made their election for submission to the ruler of Lahore, and withdrew from this period from further connection with the Cabul court or its officers.

In February 1805, Runjeet Singh returned to his capital, which was now established at Lahore, and celebrating there the Hooli Saturnalia, he went afterwards with a slight attendance to the annual fair, held at the time of performing ablutions in the Ganges at Hurdwar. The ceremonies of his religion being there completed, he returned towards the beginning of June, and employed the rains in farming out the revenues of the districts retained in his personal administration to the highest bidders. This has ever been his only scheme of revenue management. The farmer has full powers even of life and death over those committed to his tender mercies, and his lease is a mere license to rob.

After the Dusera of 1805, the Sikh army was again led by Runjeet Singh into the Mahomedan territory between the Chenab and Indus, and the chief of Jhung was called upon to settle for an annual tribute, the demand upon him being now raised to 120,000 rupees. Before, however, this negotiation could be brought to a conclusion, Runjeet was recalled by intelligence of the near approach of Jeswunt Rao Holkar and Ameer

Khan from the east, pursued by the British army under Lord Lake. Futeh Singh Aloo-wala was accordingly left to make arrangements with the chiefs of the west, and Runjeet, hastening back to Amritsur, met there the fugitive Mahratta, with whom he had no easy part to play. Jeswunt Rao threatened to continue his flight westward towards the Cabul dominions. Lord Lake, however, had arrived on the Beas, and was prepared to follow, and it was neither convenient nor wise to permit operations of the kind that must ensue to be carried on in the Punjab. On the other hand, Runjeet, though he would have proved an useful auxiliary to either party, was sensible of his inability to offer open resistance. In this state of things, the relations he maintained with Jeswunt Rao Holkar were friendly, but not encouraging, and that chief, being disappointed in the hope of rousing the Sikh nation to a co-operation in hostility with him against the British, yielded to the difficulties by which he was surrounded, and made his terms with Lord Lake, in a treaty concluded on the 24th December, 1805. Friendly engagements were further exchanged by the British commander with Runjeet Singh and the Aloowala sir-dar; and in January 1806 the two armies, which had inspired so much alarm in the Punjab, returned to Hindustan, leaving the Sikh chiefs to celebrate the Hooli unembarrassed by their presence. Runjeet Singh's excesses at this festival produced a disease which confined him for four months.

It was upon this occasion, as before mentioned, that the last Gurumata, or national council, was held, with a view to decide on the means to avert the danger threatened to the country by the presence of the English and Mahratta armies. It was attended, according to Malcolm, by few chiefs, and most of the absentees, who had any power, were bold and forward in their offers to resist any resolution to which this council might come. "The intrigues and negotiations of all appeared indeed, at this moment, to be entirely directed to objects of personal resentment, or personal aggrandizement; and every shadow of that concord, which once formed the strength of the Sikh nation, seemed to be extinguished."

Towards the end of the rains, Runjeet reappeared in a new field, and entered on measures which, in their sequel, had a material influence on his future destiny and fortunes.

The Rajas of Puteala and Naba were at feud, on account of some lands situated between the village of Doluddee and the town and fort of Naba. The Jheend chief, Raja Bhag Singh, was the ally of Naba, and so were the Ladwa and Kytul chiefs, but their united forces were unequal to a contest with their powerful neighbour of Puteala. In this extremity, Bhag Singh, of Jheend, the maternal uncle of Runjeet, was deputed to invite his assistance to the weaker party; and the Dusera was no sooner over, than the ruler of Lahore hastened across the Sutluj to take part in this quarrel. He passed the river at Lodiana, and, mastering the place, presented it to Raja Bhag Singh, in exclusion of Rani Noorun-Nissa, mother of Rao Ilias, to whom it had belonged. Sanewal was next seized from another defenceless widow,* this class of occupants being regarded by Runjeet as his legitimate prey. The place was given in jagir to Mohkum Chund Dewan, but restored afterwards on realization of a nuzurana of 30,000 rupees. Driving the Puteala troops out of Doluddee, the invader approached Munsurpur, where Maha Raja Saheb Singh, successor to Umur Singh, was in position, with his main body. The Maha Raja, by a sum of money and the present of a piece of artillery, propitiated the Lahore chief, and Juswunt Singh, of Naba, contributed also to satisfy his cupidity, whereupon he was induced to remove the scourge of his ill-organized army of plunderers back into the Punjab. Doluddee was restored to Puteala, at the intercession of Raja Bhag Singh, and Runjeet Singh, taking the opportunity to pass the Dewali and perform his ablutions in the holy tank of Thanesur, re-crossed the Sutluj after that festival, and bent his course by the way of

Rahoon, the residence of Tara Singh Ghyba,* to the holy fires of Juwala Mookhee. Here he met Raja Sunsar Chund, of Kangra, who solicited his aid against Umur Singh, the Goorka commander, before whom all the chiefs of the hills, from the Gogra to the Sutluj, had fallen in succession, and whose detachments were then ravaging Kangra. The price demanded by Runjeet for his services being deemed excessive, the interview led to no present arrangement between the chiefs; but, as the difficulties of the Hill Raja increased, the negotiation was afterwards renewed.†

* Captain Wade states that Tara Singh died during this expedition, and that on this occasion Runjeet Singh made an acquisition of eight lakhs of rupees in cash, and of the jewels of the deceased chief, which were of great value. The treasure is alleged to be the first of any extent that was so obtained. Captain Murray, however, places the death of Tara Singh in 1807-8, during the second expedition of Runjeet Singh across the Sutluj, and Captain Wade appears to have confounded the two visits.

† The result of Runjeet Singh's expedition of this season, from the time of his leaving Amritsur until his return, is stated by Khooshwuqt Rae to have been seven elephants, nine pieces of ordnance, fifty horses, and about two lakhs of rupees in cash. In

The year 1807 was marked by the lapse and resumption of Pursroor and Chumara, possessions of Nur Singh, deceased, an old Sikh sirdar. A jagir for mere subsistence was assigned to the son. Runjeet next prepared a formidable expedition against Kasoor, which had long been a thorn in the side of his power, and from the conquest of which, as being a Musulman possession, he hoped for an access of credit and popularity amongst his own sect and nation. In February, 1807, he invaded the territory with a large force, and Kutub-ud-deen was compelled to shut himself up in his fortress at Kasoor. Internal seditions and broils completed the ruin of this Patan family, and in March the chief surrendered at discretion. He was left in possession of a small territory south of the Sutluj, and bound to furnish a contingent of troops on demand. Kasoor itself and all the territory held by the family in the Punjab were resumed, and assigned for the present in jagir to Nyal Singh Utharawala. From Kasoor, Runjeet proceeded towards Multan, and occupied and kept garrisons in various dependencies of that government. In April, the town of Multan was mastered, but the governor held out the fort, into which the principal inhabitants had retired with their valuables. Being unprovided with the means of siege, Runjeet accepted a sum of money from Mozuffur Khan, and returned to Lahore in May.

1807, Jodh Singh was gained over to close alliance with Runjeet, and Khooshtuq Rae gives a long detail of the means used to cajole him. Amongst other things, Runjeet Singh asked permission to inspect the fort of Ramgurb, and went there thinly attended. He professed great admiration of the fortifications, and ordered the foundations of a fort for himself, afterwards called Govindgurb, to be laid down according to the same plan. Jodh Singh was the son of Jassa Singh, Maha Singh's ally against Jy Singh. He joined with his misul the army that was led by Runjeet Singh against Kasoor in 1807, which is stated at 30,000 horse, being the united force of the Sukurchukeas, Ghuneeas, Aloowalas, and Rumgurbheas. After eight days' fighting, an out-work of the place was carried, when, Shurf-ud-deen and others deserting, Kutub-ud-deen surrendered.

Mozuffur Khan is said to have paid eighty thousand rupees, and to have given five horses, to be rid of the Sikh army. During the march back, a zemindar came up mounted on a fine horse to pay his respects. Runjeet Singh coveted the horse, and his over-zealous courtiers demanded it rudely. The rider, being offended, rode up to Runjeet's elephant and made several cuts at him. The guard and attendants gathered round, but none was found that could match the zemindar in horsemanship and sword-play. After having wounded and unhorsed several, he was shot and his horse thus secured.

In the interval, before the rains, he detached a force against Adeenanugur, under the Kangra hills, and levied exactions in that neighbourhood from several Sikh and mountain chiefs, who had hitherto enjoyed immunity from their dependence on the Ghunee Misul, with the head of which, Suda Koonwur, Runjeet stood in such close relation. The measure gave offence to that lady, and the foundation was thus laid for the differences and intrigues which led eventually to her ruin.

The wife of the Puteala Raja was an ambitious intriguing woman who had long sought to set aside her husband, or at least to procure the assignment of a separate territory for her minor son Kurum Singh. When Jeswunt Rao Holkar passed through Puteala, on his way to the Punjab, she had endeavoured to make him instrumental to her views, and that wily chief made the state of things which prevailed conducive to his own enrichment, but being pressed for time, in consequence of the approach of Lord Lake, he left matters between the raja and rani as they were. The quarrel being now renewed, the rani sent, in the rains of 1807, to invite Runjeet Singh to espouse her cause, promising him a famous brass piece of ordnance belonging to the family, and which bore the name of Kuree Khan, and also a diamond necklace of known value, as the price of his assistance. The Lahore chief gladly seized the occasion to interfere, and crossed the Sutluj at Huree-ke-Puttun. In the month of September, on his route towards Puteala, he seized all the remaining possessions of the deceased Ilias-Rae, and distributed them amongst his dependants and allies. Before Runjeet reached Puteala, the raja and rani had come to a reconciliation, the latter having, through the mediation of the Jheend and Thanesur chiefs, obtained for her son a separate jagir of 50,000 rupees per annum. The raja now made some demur to render up the gun and necklace promised by his rani, but Runjeet appealed to the invitation he had received, and his appeal being backed by the condition of his force, the two articles were given up according to promise, though with evident reluctance. Runjeet marched to reduce Nurayungurb, which was surrendered, and made over to the Aloowala chief, after an unsuccessful attempt to take it by storm, which was attended with a loss of near 400 killed and wounded.

While engaged before Nurayungurb, the old chief Tara Singh Ghyba, who was serving with Runjeet Singh, died, and his followers secretly conveyed the corpse across the Sutluj to his fort of Rahun, where the funeral obsequies were performed, and the widow and sons made preparation to maintain their possessions. While the body, however, was yet on the pyre, Runjeet Singh's detachment, which had followed on the event being ascertained, arrived to demand a surrender of treasures, and to enforce a resumption of the chief's territory. After a slight resistance, the family was compelled to submit, and though the sons at first received a small provision for subsistence, they were soon deprived of even this means of support, and have since lived in indigence. On his route back from Nurayungurh, Runjeet seized Moonda, south of the Sutluj, from the son of Dhurum Singh, and sold it to the Jheend sirdar: and Bhulolpoor and Bhurtgurh were similarly taken from Bhughael Singh's widow.

It was about this time, that is, towards the close of 1807, that Mohkum Chund presented himself at the court of Runjeet Singh, and was appointed Dewan. He had served in this capacity with Saheb Singh of Goojrat, and, until his appointment, Runjeet Singh had no officer of this description.

In December, Runjeet Singh returned to Lahore, and was presented by his wife, Mehtab-Koonwur, with twins. The boys were named Sher Singh and Tara Singh, but Runjeet never fully acknowledged them as his own offspring. Mehtab-Koonwur's fidelity had for some time been suspected by her husband, and she had, in consequence, been living with her mother, Suda Koonwur. The report ran, that the boys were procured by the latter from a carpenter and weaver, and were produced as born to her daughter, the public having, for some time previously, been prepared for the birth, by reports circulated of Mehtab being with child.

The commencement of 1808 was marked by the seizure of Puthan Kot,* under the Kangra hills, belonging to Jymul Ghunea, and by exactions from chiefs in the hills and plains in that direction. Mohkum Chund Dewan was employed simultaneously in settling arrangements with the dependants of the Duleala Misul, at the head of which Tara Singh Ghyba had continued, while he lived. Most of the feudatories were confirmed, on their agreeing to transfer their allegiance, and furnish contingents of horse, to be constantly in attendance. Seal-Kot and Sheikhpura, south of the Sutluj, were next seized, and annexed to the immediate territory of the Lahore chief, by Mohkum Chund; and the Dewan, being kept in the field during the rains, seized various other places on both sides of the Sutluj, from the Anundpur Mukawal valley downwards, and confirmed to his master all that had formerly belonged to Tara Singh or to Bhughael Singh.

The extensive permanent occupations and usurpations, thus made by Runjeet Singh, on the east and south banks of the Sutluj, excited the alarm of the Sikh chiefs situated between that river and the Jumna, and, after a conference, they determined to send a mission to Delhi, composed of Raja Bhag Singh, of Jheend, Bhae Lal Singh, of Kytul, and Chyn Singh Dewan, of Puteala, to solicit that their possessions might be taken under the protection of the British Government. The mission reached Delhi, and waited on Mr. Seton, the Resident, in March, 1808. The answer they received, though not decisive, was encouraging to their hope that the Lahore ruler would not be suffered to extend his usurpations eastward. Intelligence of this mission, however, no sooner reached Lahore, than Runjeet, feeling disquieted, despatched agents to invite the three chiefs who composed it to wait upon him, that he might endeavour to allay their fears. They accordingly went to his camp at Amritsur, where they were received with much favour, and no effort was spared to detach them from the design of forming any connection with the British Government.

Pending these transactions, upon the alarm of an invasion of India being meditated by the French emperor, Lord Minto determined to send missions to ascertain the condition of the intervening countries, and the feeling of their rulers, chiefs, and people. The growing power of Runjeet Singh, whose authority was now completely established in the Punjab, made it essential to include his court, and the collision threatened by the recent proceedings and known designs of Runjeet, east of the Sutluj, formed an additional motive for deputing a British agent to Lahore. Mr. (now Lord) Metcalfe was the negotiator selected on this occasion, and the announcement of the intended deputation was received by Runjeet Singh, while the Jheend and Kytul chiefs were in attendance on him. To them the contents of the despatch were communicated, and the matter formed the subject of much anxious deliberation. It was determined to receive Mr. Metcalfe at Kasoor, whither Runjeet marched for the purpose, in September, 1808.

On the envoy's arrival, he was received with the usual attentions, but had scarcely found an opportunity to enter on the subjects proposed for discussion with the Sikh chief, when the latter suddenly broke up his camp from Kasoor, and crossed the Sutluj with his army. Fureed-Kot was immediately occupied by him and made over to Suda Koonwur, Goolab Singh being ejected, and Runjeet then proceeded against the Musulman possession of Muler Kotila. The Patan family holding it was reduced to extremity, and agreed to a large money-payment, giving a bond of a lakh of rupees, to which the Puteala Raja was induced, by the deposit of some strongholds, to be surety. Mr. Metcalfe accompanied Runjeet Singh to Fureed-Kot, but refused to countenance any military operations east of the Sutluj. He accordingly remained near that river until his government should determine what to do in the juncture, and addressed in the interval a strong remonstrance against such aggressions, committed in the very face of his proposition to make the matter the subject of discussion and negotiation between the governments.

In the meantime, Runjeet continued his progress to Umbala, which, with its dependencies, he seized, and made over to the Naba and Kytul chiefs. He then exacted tribute from Shahabad and Thanesur, and returning by Puteala, made a brotherly exchange of turbands with the weak Raja Saheb Singh. After this expedition, he again gave Mr. Metcalfe the meeting at Amritsur. The government at Calcutta had in October determined on its course, and the envoy was now instructed to avow, that the country between the Sutluj and the Jumna was under British protection, and although that government had no design to require the surrender of possessions occupied before its interposition, it must insist on the restoration of all that had been seized during the late expedition of Runjeet Singh. To enforce this demand, and support the negotiation, a body of troops was advanced to the frontier under Colonel (afterwards Sir David) Ochterlony, and an army of reserve was formed and placed under the command of Major-General St. Leger, to be prepared for any extended operations, which the activity and supposed hostile designs of Runjeet might render necessary.

Colonel Ochterlony crossed the Jumna at Boorea on the 16th January, 1809, and as he approached Umbala, Runjeet Singh's detachment retired to the Sutluj. Taking on his way the several places visited by the Sikh army, the British commander reached Lodiana on the Sutluj, and took up a position there on the 18th February following. His march was hailed by the people as well as chiefs, as affording a promise of future protection and tranquillity, and they vied with one another in the display of their gratitude.

Up to this period, Runjeet had maintained, in the conferences to which the envoy was admitted, that the Jumna, and not the Sutluj, was the proper boundary of the British possessions, and that, in right of his supremacy over the Sikh nation, no less than as Governor of Lahore, he was warranted in asserting feudal superiority over all the chiefs of that nation between those two rivers. The existing independence of Puteala, and the other principalities, had no weight in argument with a chief, whose title was the right to plunder and usurp, according to the condition of his army. The arrival of Colonel Ochterlony on the Sutluj, however, opened his eyes to a new fear, which was, that if he longer resisted, offers of protection might be made to chiefs in the Punjab, which must involve him in collision, and, perhaps, hostility, with a power he never thought himself capable of seriously opposing in the field. His resolutions were hastened by an event that occurred in his camp. The Mohurrum, the first and sacred month of the Mahomedans, commenced in 1809 towards the end of February, and the followers of this faith, in the suite of the envoy, prepared to celebrate the deaths of Husun and Hoosein, the two sons of Ali, with the usual ceremonies. The Akalis, or fanatic priests of the Sikhs, took umbrage at this performance of Moslem rites in the Sikh camp and at Amritsur, and, collecting in a body, headed by Phoola Singh, a bigot of notorious turbulence, they opened a fire of matchlocks, and attacked the envoy's camp.* The escort was called out, and, though composed of two companies of native infantry and sixteen troopers only, this small body charged and routed their party; after which, the biers were buried with the usual forms. Runjeet himself came up at the close of the fight, and immediately it was over, advanced in person to make apologies to the envoy, expressing his admiration of the discipline and order displayed by the British detachment, and promising his best exertions to prevent any repetition of such disorders. The circumstance made an impression on his mind as to the unfitness of his own troops to cope with those under European discipline, and determined him to secure peace and friendship at the sacrifices demanded.

* Khooshwagt Rae says the Akalis intended to have taken their revenge upon the mission by a night attack, to prevent which Runjeet Singh sent 500 of his best troops to mount guard about the camp of Mr. Metcalfe, who, in the morning, moved to a greater distance from Amritsur, and the Akalis dug up and burned the buried biers and every relic they could find of the Mahomedan rite.

The British Government were sensible, that, having interfered to impose restraints on the ambition of Runjeet Singh, it had little to expect from his friendship, in case of any necessity arising to arm against invasion from the west. Had danger, indeed, from that quarter been more imminent, it would probably have been deemed politic to extend our direct influence farther into the Punjab, to reduce the power of a chief who shewed himself so unfriendly. But by the time arrangements had to be concluded, the apprehension of any danger had worn off, and the only remaining object was, to secure our own frontier, and, for the credit of our power, to take redress for the offensive aggressions which the Lahore ruler had recently committed east of the Sutluj. Runjeet expressed a strong desire at this time to obtain a written pledge of our pacific and friendly intentions towards himself; and the restoration of the places seized during his late inroad having been obtained from him, a short treaty, declaratory of mutual peace and friendship, was concluded by the envoy, at Amritsur, on the 25th April, 1809. Its stipulations were to the following effect:—

First.—“Perpetual friendship shall subsist between the British Government and the State of Lahore; the latter shall be considered, with respect to the former, to be on the footing of the most favoured powers, and the British Government will have no concern with the territories and subjects of the Raja to the northward of the river Sutluj.

Second.—“The Raja will never maintain, in the territory which he occupies on the left bank of the Sutluj, more troops than are necessary for the internal duties of the territory, nor commit or suffer any encroachment on the possessions or rights of the chiefs in its vicinity.

Third.—“In the event of a violation of any of the preceding articles, or of a departure from the rules of friendship, on the part of either state, this treaty shall be considered to be null and void.”

The treaty being concluded, Mr. Metcalfe came away on the 1st May following. All further discussions with Runjeet Singh were then dropped, and it became a principle, in all relations with this chief, to confine communications, as much as possible, to friendly letters and the exchange of presents; but the British officers on the frontier were instructed to watch the proceedings of Runjeet, and to require instant redress, in case of any infringement of the terms of the treaty, by interference with, or encroachment on, the rights and territories of chiefs and sirdars east or south of the river Sutluj. By this treaty Runjeet was guaranteed in the possession of territory on the left of the Sutluj, yielding more than twelve lakhs of rupees, and capable of yielding twelve times that amount.

CHAPTER XI.

THE declarations, with which the British force under Colonel Ochterlony advanced to the Sutluj, were in strict conformity with the application made by the chiefs occupying the country between the Indus and Sutluj, through the mission deputed by them to Delhi, in March, 1808. Protection was promised, and no demand of tribute or of contribution of any kind made, to defray the charges incurred by the obligation to afford it. Their recent experience of the rapacity of a Sikh army, and the conviction that there could be no security to themselves, and still less to their families, under a ruler like the chief who had now the ascendant in the Sikh nation, made all the sirdars rejoice that their prayer had been acceded to by the British Government; and the advance of its forces to the Sutluj was looked upon in conse-

A treaty having been now concluded with Runjeet Singh, it became necessary to fix, somewhat more specifically than had been hitherto done, the relations that were to subsist henceforward between the protecting power and its protected dependants. It was determined to give the desired explanation of the views of the British Government on this subject, by a general proclamation, rather than by entering into any separate engagement with the numerous chiefs affected by the measure. Accordingly, on the 6th May, 1809, an Itala-nama, or general declaration, was circulated amongst the sirdars, intimating to them as follows:—

First.—That the territories of Sirhind and Malwa (the designation assumed by the Sikhs of Puteala, Naba, Jheend, and Kytul) had been taken under British protection, and Runjeet Singh had bound himself by treaty to exercise in future no interference therein.

Second.—That it was not the intention of the British Government to demand any tribute from the chiefs and sirdars benefiting by this arrangement.

Third.—That the chiefs and sirdars would be permitted to exercise, and were for the future secured in, the rights and authorities they possessed in their respective territories prior to, and at the time of, the declaration of protection by the British Government.

Fourth.—That the chiefs and sirdars should be bound to offer every facility and accommodation to British troops and detachments, employed in securing the protection guaranteed, or for purposes otherwise connected with the general interests of the state, whenever the same might be marched into, or stationed in, their respective territories.

Fifth.—In case of invasion or war, the sirdars were to join the British standard with their followers, whenever called upon.

Sixth.—Merchants conveying articles, the produce of Europe, for the use of the detachments at Lodiana, or of any other British force or detachment, should not be subject to transit duty, but must be protected in their passage through the Sikh country.

Seventh.—In like manner, horses for the cavalry, when furnished with passports from competent officers, must be exempt from all tax.

The above declaration, being published and circulated, became the charter of rights, to which the chiefs have since appealed for the settlement of all questions that have arisen between them and the British Government. The matters specifically provided for were those only that were urgent. There has been much intricate dispute between rival candidates for sirdarees :—between chiefs who had divided their territory before the declaration of protection was published, and had bound themselves to their co-proprietors by mutual obligations; between chiefs and their dependants of the Sikh nation, as well as zemindars, as to the extent of right and authority possessed at the time of the declaration of protection;—and, perhaps more than all, boundary disputes and quarrels regarding participated rights. These differences, whenever they have arisen, have required adjustment and arbitration by the British officers on the spot, and have formed the subject of continual references to the supreme government at Calcutta. The regulation of successions was also a matter that from the first required to be undertaken by the protecting authority, and failing heirs of any kind, according to Sikh custom and law, the escheat is considered to fall to the protecting state.

Until the year 1812, the duties of protection, and the settlement of these mutual disputes, though giving constant employment to Colonel Ochterlony, the British officer appointed superintendent of Sikh affairs, produced nothing of sufficient moment to require relation. In that year, however, the disorders in Puteala, consequent upon the raja's imbecility, produced a crisis that called for authoritative interference. The protected territory was invaded by a public depredator, for whose punishment and expulsion the Puteala raja was called upon to furnish a quota of horse. This chief holds territory yielding a revenue of more than thirty lakhs of rupees, yet the whole force he could furnish on the occasion consisted only of two hundred horse, of the very worst description, and these arrived so late in the field as to be of no use. Colonel Ochterlony, taking with him the chiefs of Jheend and Naba, proceeded to Puteala, to remonstrate with Maharaja Saheb Singh upon the evidence of inefficiency afforded by this state of things, and endeavoured to persuade him to discard the low favourites, who ate up his revenues, and prevented those better disposed from carrying on a consistent system of government, and introducing the desired improvements into the administration. The attempt to procure a change of ministers by persuasion failed, but the raja made many professions of a determination to effect the desired reforms. Being left again to himself, his conduct became so violent and irregular, as to betray symptoms of an aberration of reason, and the colonel was compelled to proceed again to his capital, in order to allow his outraged subjects and dependants to put things on a better footing, and to prevent the raja's removal from power from disturbing the general tranquillity. Saheb Singh was now deposed, and placed under limited restraint. Askoor Rani, his wife, in association with a shrewd Bramin minister, named Nundee Rao, was appointed regent for the heir-apparent, Kurum Singh, who was then a minor, and affairs were conducted in his name. Maharaja Saheb Singh died a few months after. The rani's doubtful reputation for chastity, and known character for turbulence and intrigue, made her administration unpopular, while the profusion of Saheb Singh had secured him many partisans. Hence the part taken by the British superintendent in the establishment of this scheme of administration, although his motives were appreciated by the discerning, made a great sensation amongst the Sikhs, by the lower order of whom, and particularly by the turbulent and designing, the raja's removal from power was regarded as an act of tyranny and injustice, produced by intrigue, and influenced by worse motives. When Colonel Ochterlony was at Puteala, in prosecution of these measures, he was attacked in his palanquin by an Akali fanatic, who with his drawn sword had nearly taken the colonel's life. He escaped, however, with slight wounds, by seizing hold of the sword, and the assassin was sentenced to be confined for life at Delhi.

In this notice of occurrences east of the Sutluj, the events of the Punjab have been anticipated. It is now time to resume the narrative of Runjeet Singh's usurpations, and of the enterprises by which he consolidated and extended his dominions.

The first operation in which the Lahore army was engaged after Mr. Metcalfe's departure, in May, 1809, was against Kangra, in the hills; but before moving in that direction, Runjeet Singh gave order to place the fort of Philor, on the Sutluj, opposite to Lodiana, and also Govind-gurh,* in Amritsur, where his treasure was deposited, in the best possible condition for defence. The walls

* Baron Hügel describes this fort as strong. Runjeet began the works in 1807. It was to have been built on the plan of Ramgurh, with the view of flattering Jodh Singh, the grandson of Jae Singh, whose co-operation in the conquest of Kasoor was required by Runjeet. The protection of the holy tank and of the pilgrims afforded a good pretext for erecting a strong place for himself. Continual improvements have now

were rebuilt, and a deep ditch, scarpd with masonry, was added to the works of both strongholds, which being completed, the chief moved into the hills.

Kangra was at this time besieged by Umur Singh Thapa, the Goorkha commander, but held out against him. The garrison, however, being reduced to extremity, Raja Sun-sar Chund tendered the place to Runjeet, on condition of his lending troops to raise the siege, and expel the Goorkhas from the territory west and north of the Sutluj. The engagement was gladly entered into by Runjeet, and on the 28th May, he arrived with his army at Puthan-Kot, in the Jalendra Turae, a possession of Jymul Ghuneea, which he seized and confiscated. Thence he sent a detachment to strengthen the forces of the confederate hill chiefs, who were at the time engaged in the attempt to cut off Umur Singh's supplies, and so compel his retirement. Umur Singh made an effort to ward off this interference, and tendered to Runjeet a money equivalent for Kangra. The fort, however, had a value in the eye of the aspiring Sikh, which made him regardless of the temptation offered to his avarice. This stronghold has the reputation in Hindustan of being impregnable. Sunsar Chund, notwithstanding his engagement, could not reconcile it to his honour to part with the fort, and evaded Runjeet Singh's importunity for a Sikh garrison to be admitted within its walls.* In August, having proceeded in person to the vicinity, and being still put off with excuses, the Sikh's patience became exhausted. He accordingly placed the Raja's

* Sunsar Chund played a double part through the whole of this negotiation. After his engagement with Runjeet Singh, he entered into a treaty with Umur Singh, promising to surrender the fort to him, and thus, obtaining leave to bring away his family, contrived to throw into the place his brother with four months' supplies, thus hoping to keep it against both claimants. Runjeet Singh, however, seized Unroth Chund as a hostage, and obtaining from Sunsar Chund an order to be received into the place, bribed Umur Singh, whose army was sickly and pressed for supplies, in order to secure access to the gate, when no opposition was offered to his entrance.

son, who was in attendance with him, under restraint, and having ascertained that the army of Umur Singh was in great straits for supplies, and short of ammunition, he directed a chosen body of Sikhs to advance boldly to the gate, and demand entrance. They suffered considerably in killed and wounded as they ascended, but on reaching the gate, were received into the fort, which thus fell into the power of Runjeet, on the 24th of August, 1809. Umur Singh, being foiled in his purpose, and having no desire to involve himself with the Sikhs, came to an understanding with Runjeet, and having secured, by his connivance, the means of transport, retired across the Sutluj.

On the 31st of September, Runjeet Singh, having completed arrangements with the hill chiefs, and taken the necessary steps to secure his possession of Kangra, returned to the Jalendra Doab, and seized the jagir of Bhughael Singh's eldest widow, who had recently died there. His dewan was similarly employed in seizing the districts of Bhoop Singh Fyzullapura, whose person he secured treacherously at an interview,

It was at this time, and influenced apparently by observation of the efficiency and discipline maintained by the British sepoys with Mr. Metcalfe, that Runjeet Singh commenced the formation of regular battalions on the British model, entertaining for the purpose Poorbees, that is, natives of the Gangetic provinces, and Sikhs from the other side of the Sutluj. These he formed into bodies of 300 and 400, and procured deserters from the British ranks, whom he employed to drill them, and nominated to be commanders, with high pay. His artillery was also formed into a separate corps, under a darogha, or superintendent; and the cavalry, attached to himself, he divided into two classes, one called the Ghor-chur Suwars, and the other the Ghor-chur Khas, the first being paid in money, and the latter by jagirs: both classes, however, were mounted on horses the property of the state.

Jodh Singh, of Vuzeerabad, died towards the close of 1809; and on the first day of the new year, Runjeet arrived there, to enforce the resumption of his territorial possessions. A large sum of money was tendered by Gundha Singh, the son of the deceased, as the price of his confirmation, and the Lahore chief's avarice being tempted, he refrained from present occupation of the estates, and conferred the shal and turband of investiture on the heir. A dispute between the father and son of Goojrat affording the opportunity,* he succeeded in expelling both, and in confiscating that territory; after which, he proceeded to the country east of the Jelum, as far as Sahawal, and exacted tribute and contributions from the Balooch and other Musulman chiefs of that quarter.

On the 2nd of February, 1810, in the midst of these operations, it was announced

* Khooshwuqt Rae says that, upon Goolab Singh's flying to Runjeet's camp, Saheb Singh of Goojrat, the father, took fright and fled to Bimbur, whereupon his whole territory, and the treasure and property in his forts, were quickly taken possession of by Runjeet, and a jagir of 12,000 rs. per annum was assigned to Goolab Singh. The plunder of this family is stated to have yielded between five and six lakhs of rupees in cash and seven hundred villages. In 1810, Saheb Singh gave himself up and obtained a jagir of 25,000 rupees per annum.

to Runjeet Singh, that Shah Shuja was approaching to seek refuge in his territory, having been compelled to yield to the ascendancy acquired by his brother, Shah Mahmud, through the vigour and talents of the Vuzeer, Futeh Khan. The ex-Shah joined the camp of Runjeet at Khooshab on the day following, and was received with outward respect, Runjeet having gone forth in person to conduct him in, and sending a zeeafut of 1,250 rs. to his tents upon his alighting. The Shah, however, returned to Rawul Pindi on the 12th of February, to join his brother Zeman Shah, leaving Runjeet to prosecute his operations against the Musulman chiefs east of the Indus. A succour of men and money had been tendered by the government of Cashmere, and by Ata Mahomed Khan, son of the old Vuzeer Sher Mahomed; and, thus aided, Shah Shuja made an attack on Peshawur, and was received there on the 20th of March. In September following, however, he was expelled by Mahomed Uzeem, brother of Futeh Khan, and driven again across the Indus, whereupon he endeavoured to obtain admission into Multan, without effect.* In the mean time, however, events of interest had occurred in the Punjab.

The Sahawal chief had accepted terms from Runjeet on the 25th of January, but failing to pay the entire amount agreed upon (80,000 rupees), that town was invested on the 7th February. Futeh Khan, the sirdar, surrendered; but upon some demur in giving up a dependency of Sahawal, named Lukh-omut, he was sent in irons to Lahore, and

* According to Khooshwuqt Rae, Shah Shuja was invited to Multan by Muzuffur Khan, with whom Vufa Begum, with the Shah's family, had already taken refuge, and had brought the Shah's jewels. Muzuffur Khan declared, he required the Shah's aid and countenance to enable him to withstand the attacks of Runjeet Singh. He no sooner, however, made his appearance under the walls, than the fort guns were opened on him, from which Khooshwuqt Rae surmises that the kiladar wished the death of the Shah, in order that he might plunder the jewels, or if he surrendered, that it was his intention to have given him up to Prince Kamran, which would equally have answered his purpose. Shah Shuja rode away beyond the reach of the fort guns, but remained in the neighbourhood until Muzuffur Khan, repenting, assigned over four purgunas, with a jagir of 10,000 rupees, for the Shah's personal expenses.

kept there in close confinement with all his family, the whole of his estate being sequestered. On the 15th February, Runjeet's army was before Ooch, the proprietors of which place, Syuds of Geelan and Bokhara, waited on the Sikh with horses, and this conduct, added to the estimation in which their tribe is held for sanctity by both Hindus and Mahomedans, propitiated the chief, and they were left in possession, under an engagement to pay tribute. On the 20th February, such was the rapidity with which Runjeet Singh prosecuted his measures, the whole Sikh army was before Multan ravaging the surrounding territory, consequent upon a refusal by Mozuffur Khan to pay the sum of three lakhs of rupees which had been demanded from him. Runjeet now required the fort of Multan, declaring that he desired it for Shah Shuja, to whom Mozuffur Khan was bound, and had engaged to render it. This specious pretext made no change in Mozuffur Khan's resolution to defend the place to the utmost. Runjeet reconnoitred, and marked out ground for different batteries, and lines of approach, assigning them to different chiefs, with the promise of rich jagirs to those who made the quickest advance and most impression. Arrangements were made to secure the transmission of supplies by water, as well as by land, from Lahore and Amritsur, and every thing betokened a determination in the Sikh chief to master this important possession.

The garrison was not disheartened, but made the best dispositions possible for defence. A large supply of grain had been laid in, and the fort contained an abundance of fresh water. The little impression made on the walls by the Sikh artillery confirmed the courage of the defenders. The great Bhangee gun, which discharged a ball of two and a half maunds kuchha (about 200 lbs.), had been brought down for the siege, but the materials for such an operation, and the necessary science and experience, were so defective in the Sikh army, that Runjeet Singh, having suffered the loss of many valuable men and officers, particularly Atar Singh, a favourite and confidential companion, who was blown up in a mine, was compelled to grant terms to Mozuffur

On the 25th of April, he returned to Lahore mortified by his ill success, and throwing the blame on his officers and jagirdars. He now devoted himself to increase the number of his regular battalions, and formed a corps of Sikhs, called Orderly Khas, or select orderlies, to whom he gave superior pay, and the advantage of carrying his dustuks, or orders, to chiefs, and districts, on whom they were thus billeted at high rates. A horse artillery was likewise formed, and improvements were set on foot in every branch of the service, which were all closely superintended by Runjeet in person.

Gundha Singh, who, in January preceding, had secured, by the sacrifice of his father's treasures, a temporary confirmation of his estates, did not long enjoy what he had purchased so dearly. In June 1810, a strong detachment was sent to Vuzeerabad, and the entire possessions of the late Jodh Singh were sequestered, a few villages only being left to afford subsistence to the youthful victim of this insidious policy. The surviving widow of Bhugael Singh, Rani Ram-Koonwur, was at the same time expelled from Bahadurpur, which she held as a jagir for subsistence. She took refuge at Lodiana, and obtained a few villages, which had belonged to her husband, on the protected side of the Sutluj.

After the Dusera, in the month of October following, Runjeet Singh moved in person to Ramnugur, on the Chenab, and summoned to his presence Nidhan Singh, of Athoo. The chief refused attendance, except under guarantee of a sodee, or Sikh priest; whereupon his fort of Duskut was invested on the 17th October. Runjeet Singh's batteries, however, opened against the place without avail, and an attempt made to influence the garrison, by severities and ill usage of their wives and families, who fell into the besieger's power, was equally ineffective. The Sikh priest, Bydee Jumeyut Singh, was then employed to mediate for the submission of this spirited chief, and upon his guarantee and the promise of a jagir, the sirdar waited on Runjeet Singh, who, regardless of the solemnity of the engagement, put him in irons. In the beginning of November, Bagh Singh Huluwala, with his son Subha Singh, who were in camp with their followers, fell under the displeasure of the Lahore chief, and were placed under restraint, and all their territorial possessions confiscated; after which, Runjeet Singh returned to his capital, and detached Mohkum Chund Dewan to enforce the collection of tribute, and to complete arrangements in the hills, where the Rajas of Bimbhur and Rajaori, and the tribe of Chibh-Bhao, were refractory.

In December, 1810, Saheb Singh, who had been expelled from Goojrat, was invited to return, and invested with a considerable jagir, and Bagh Singh Huluwala was released from confinement, and similarly honoured. In the same month, the release of Nidhan Singh was obtained by the Bydee priests, who felt their honour concerned in his treatment, after one of their body had been inveigled to give a personal guarantee. They accordingly sat *dhurna on Runjeet, until he consented to release his prisoner: Nidhan Singh would, however, accept no jagir, or stipend, but retired from the Lahore dominions, and took service with the governor of Cashmere.

* The practice of "sitting dhurna" is employed by persons of high-caste to extort from the superstitious prejudices

In January, 1811, Futeh Khan, of Sahe-wal, was liberated with his family at the intercession of an Udasi priest, and retired to Bahawulpur. A small jagir was likewise conferred on Dhurum Singh, the ejected proprietor of Dhurum-Kot, in the Jalendra, after which, Runjeet proceeded on a tour to Pind-Dadur-Khan, in which vicinity he captured three small forts belonging to Musulman chiefs; but on the the 24th February, intelprejudices of another compliance with an act of justice. Lord Teignmouth says that, in North-western India, the Bramin, who resorts to this expedient, proceeds to the door of the person against whom it is directed, or wherever he may most conveniently intercept him, and sits down, with poison, or some weapon, in his hand, threatening to use it should the other molest him; in this situation he fasts, and by the rigour of etiquette, the other is bound to fast too, and they both starve till he who sits dhurna obtains satisfaction. Should the latter perish by hunger, the sin would for ever lie on the other's head. The expedient has rarely failed.

ligence reached his camp, that Shah Mahmud had crossed the Indus, with 12,000 Afghans, before whom the inhabitants of the country were flying. Runjeet immediately took up a position at Rawul-Pindi, and deputed his secretary, Hukeem Uzeez-ud-Deen, to inquire of the Shah his views in this incursion. This agent was crossed by emissaries from the Shah, on their way to Rawul-Pindi, for the purpose of explaining, that the punishment of Ata Mahomed, and the governors of Attock and Cashmere, who had aided Shah Shuja's late attempt on Peshawur, was the only object of the present march; whereupon Runjeet, being relieved from his apprehensions, waited upon the Shah, and, after a friendly interview, both returned to their respective capitals. Runjeet found at Lahore a carriage from Calcutta, which had been forwarded as a present from the Governor-General, Lord Minto. This was the first vehicle on springs in which he had ever sat, and the novelty and ease of motion were highly gratifying to him. The chief, however, was too wily to adopt generally this mode of conveyance, which would have imposed the necessity of first making roads.

In April and May, Runjeet Singh had armies in three directions, one about Kangra, collecting tributes; a second acting against Bimbur and Rajaori, and the third, under his son Khuruk Singh, accompanied by Dewan Mohkum Chund, resuming the possessions of the Nukee chiefs. Runjeet remained in person at his capital, directing the whole, and this period of his life is marked by the sudden rise to favour of a young Gour Bramin, named Khooshal Singh, upon whom the most extravagant gifts were daily lavished, and who was raised to the important and lucrative office of Deohree Wala, or Lord Chamberlain, with the rank of Raja, and vested besides with extensive jagirs. Runjeet Singh had ever led a most dissolute life; his debaucheries, particularly during the Hooli and Dussera, were shameless, and the scenes exhibited on such occasions openly before the court, and even in the streets of Lahore, were the conversation of Hindustan, and rival the worst that is reported in history of the profligacies of ancient Rome. The chief himself would parade the streets in a state of inebriety, on the same elephant with his courtesans, amongst whom one named Mora acquired most celebrity by her shamelessness, and by the favour with which she was treated. Coin was at one time struck in her name, and her influence seemed without bounds. In August of this year, however, she was discarded, and incarcerated in Puthan-Kot, and the favour she enjoyed seemed to be transferred to the Bramin youth and his brothers. If this conduct in the ruler of Lahore should excite surmises, as to the motives of the extraordinary attachment shewn to a graceful youth of the appearance of Khooshal Singh, the reader must yet make allowances for the habits in which the chief was brought up, and the examples by which he was surrounded. The Sikhs are notoriously addicted to the most detestable vices, and the worst that is said of Roman and Grecian indulgence would find a parallel at the durbars of the chiefs of this nation on either side of the Sutluj. But the reputation of Runjeet Singh, though justly, it is feared, tainted with the foul blemish, did not suffer in the eyes of his nation from this cause.

Of the twelve original misuls, or confederacies of the Sikhs, there were now remaining in the Punjab, only that of Runjeet himself, the Sukurchukea, with the Ghunea, Ramgurhea, and Aloowala, all closely associated with him, and ranged, it may be said, under his standard. The Phoolkea and Nihung misuls, which, being settled east of the Sutluj, enjoyed the advantage of British protection, and the Fyzullapurea, which had possessions on both sides that river, and the head of which, Boodh Singh sirdar, had uniformly declined to give his personal attendance at Lahore, complete the list which Runjeet Singh was aiming further to reduce. The conduct of Boodh Singh at last brought down upon him the vengeance of the Lahore ruler. On the 19th September, 1811, Dewan Mohkum Chund, attended by Jodh Singh Ramgurhea and other sirdars, entered the Jalendra Doab, with the declared design of seizing the Fyzullapurea possessions in the Punjab. Boodh Singh waited not for the attack, but fled immediately to Lodiana for personal security. His troops, influenced by the point of honour, made a resistance of some days, before surrendering the principal forts of Jalendra and Puttee, but gave both up on the 6th and 7th of October, before any impression had been made on the walls or defences, and after a needless sacrifice of lives. Boodh Singh has since been content with the lot of a protected Sikh chief, living on the means afforded by his possessions east and south of the Sutluj. In December, Nidhan Singh, son of the old Ghunea Chief Jy Singh, was deprived of the separate jagir assigned to him, in order to secure the sirdaree to his elder brother's widow, Suda Koonwur. His person was seized and placed under restraint at Lahore, while a detachment marched to capture his two forts of Hajipur and Phoolwara, no tie of affinity being recognized as a motive for deviating from the systematic prosecution of the course of policy, by which it appears Runjeet Singh regulated his conduct, viz. the determination to level into subjects and dependants every one who was in a position to assert independence, or who prided himself on a separate origin, and enjoyed patrimonies won by his own or his ancestors' swords. Runjeet, who was himself free-spoken, and allowed great latitude in conversation to his courtiers, received at this period a rebuke for the grasping disposition he displayed in his treatment of the old Sikh sirdars, from Jodh Singh Ramghurea, himself a reduced chief of the class. When taking his leave to join Mohkum Chund, in the operations against the Fyzulapurea sirdar, Runjeet ordered him presents, as a mark of favour. He begged, however, with characteristic frankness, that such honours might be dispensed with in his case, for he should deem himself fortunate in these times if allowed to keep his own turband on his head. Runjeet took no offence at this freedom, but smiled, and told him to be faithful and of good cheer.

The year 1811 closed with a visit to Lahore by Shah Zeman, the blind brother in exile of Shah Shuja. He came with his family and dependants in November, but experiencing only neglect from the Sikh chief, returned soon after to Rawul-Pindi, where he had been residing for some months. Shah Shuja, since his failure in September to obtain reception at Multan, embarked in a desperate attempt to push his fortune again beyond the Indus. He was, however, defeated with the loss of his principal officer, Ukrum Khan, and compelled to seek personal safety in secret flight. The brothers had, in the early part of the year, deputed a son of Zeman Shah to Lodiana, to learn if there was any hope of assistance in men or money from the British Government. The prince, however, though received with much attention and civility, was distinctly informed, that no such expectations must be entertained by either member of the royal family of Cabul.

CHAPTER XII.

IN the beginning of the year 1812, the court of Lahore was occupied in preparations for celebrating with due magnificence the marriage of the heir-apparent, Koonwur Khuruk Singh, with the daughter of Jymul Ghunea, the same chief from whom Runjeet Singh had taken Puthan-Kot, in the Julendra Turæe. An invitation was sent to Colonel Ochterlony at Lodiana to honour the ceremonies with his presence, and an envoy being despatched to conduct him to Lahore, the colonel crossed the Sutluj on the 23rd of January, with a small escort, to which, by particular desire of Runjeet, a galloper gun was attached, the Sikh chief's curiosity to see how this branch of artillery was equipped in the British service being intense. Colonel Ochterlony was accompanied by the Rajas of Naba, Jheend, and Kytul, and on arriving near Amritsur, on the 28th, received the istugbal, or meeting of honour, from the chief of the Sikhs, who had gathered to his court, on this occasion, all his sirdars, and indeed the whole nation appeared to be assembled to do honour to the nuptials.

The ceremony was performed at the residence of Sirdar Jymul Singh, in Futehgurh, and, after its conclusion, on the 6th of February, the whole party returned to Amritsur. Suda Koonwur alone was not present; indisposition was assigned as the reason of her non-attendance on the occasion, but her dissatisfaction at the failure of an attempt to procure from Runjeet, her son-in-law, the public acknowledgment, during these ceremonies, of the two boys she had brought up as twins born to her daughter, was generally believed to be the true cause of her absence.

Runjeet Singh received Colonel Ochterlony with marked distinction, appointed his principal officers to shew him every object worth seeing at Lahore, and pressed upon him an invitation to stay and see the festivities of the Hooli, which would be celebrated in March. The colonel declined this honour for himself, but the Sikh chiefs who had come with him gladly accepted it, and the Bhye of Kytul obtained by cunning and intrigue, during the orgies, a grant from the Lahore ruler of Goojurawul, on the protected side of the Sutluj. The frank confidence displayed by Runjeet in his present reception of Colonel Ochterlony was much in contrast with the suspicious mistrust with which Mr. Metcalfe had been treated. Runjeet shewed the colonel his troops, and particularly the new battalions he was raising; took him over the fortifications of Lahore, and inspected with him some new works he was constructing for their improvement, and to connect the Juma Musjid with the palace.

His prudent dewan, Mohkum Chund, and the Sirdar Gundha Singh, are reported to have remonstrated against the communication of such knowledge to a professional person of a nation that might have designs against him. Runjeet, however, observed with shrewdness, that if such were their sentiments, they should have advised his withholding the invitation altogether from the colonel.

After the conclusion of these ceremonies and festivities, the armies of Lahore resumed active operations. Koonwur Khuruk Singh was sent with a strong force against Bimbur and Rajaoree, where Sooltan Khan, the Musulman holder of the former territory, proved a formidable enemy, having recently overpowered and slain his relation, Ismael Khan, who had been left, as the result of previous operations, in the possession and management of a large portion of the territory. Dul Singh was at the same time sent with another force to plunder and levy tribute from Muzuffur Khan, at Multan; and a third, under Desa Singh, was again detached to Kangra. Runjeet in person made a tour into the Jalendra Doab, towards the Turæe, whither he summoned various hill chiefs, and made with them fresh arrangements, attended with increase of tribute. The resumption of Shujanpur from Boodh Singh Bhugut was the only operation of that kind effected on this occasion. Returning to Lahore, on the 23rd of May, Runjeet received intelligence there of the success of Khuruk Singh against Bimbur, Jummoo, and Aknur. The Koonwur was honoured with a grant of these places in jagir, and he placed them in the management of Bhye Ram Singh. Dul Singh had also succeeded in extorting a considerable sum from Mozuffur Khan, of Multan.

In August of the same year, Jymul Singh, the father-in-law of Khuruk Singh, died suddenly, and it was generally believed that his death was occasioned by poison administered by his wife. Runjeet constituted himself the heir to all the treasure accumulated by this chief during a long life of parsimony and usurious dealing. Much of his wealth was, at the time of his decease, out at interest with mahajuns of Amritsur, all of whom were called upon to account with the Lahore treasury. In the following month, the families of the two ex-Shahs of Cabul (Shah Zeman and Shah Shuja) sought an asylum at Lahore. After escaping from the unfortunate enterprise Shah Shuja had undertaken in September preceding, his person was seized by Juhan Dad Khan, the governor of Attock, by whom he was sent to his brother, Ata Mahomed, of Cashmere, who held him a close prisoner. The helpless Shah Zeman brought both families to the Sikh capital, where Runjeet Singh professed much interest in the misfortunes and fate of Shah Shuja, and seemed as if disposed to make an effort against Cashmere, to procure his liberation, and to obtain that province for him. He was then preparing an expedition against Bimbur, in the Pir-Panjial range of mountains, and the wife of Shah Shuja was led by these professions to believe, and to represent to her husband, that he would find a friend in the ruler of Lahore. The Shah made his escape from confinement during the operations subsequently undertaken against the valley by Futeh Khan Vuzeer, and was thus led to direct his flight towards Lahore. Finding an opportunity to join the force under Mohkum Chund, he came down with him to that city.

After the Dussera, at the close of the rains, the Sikh army was assembled, and led entire, by Runjeet in person, against the Musulman chiefs of Bimbur and Rajaoree, who, though pressed by the expeditions before directed against them, made head again, immediately the force was withdrawn, and were now assisted by a confederacy of chiefs and jagirdars of their faith, and by succour from the Governor of Cashmere. The possessions of these chiefs commanded the approaches to the Pir-Panjal mountains, and there is reason to believe that Runjeet Singh had, even at this time, an eye to the conquest of the valley of Cashmere, to which the occupation of both Bimbur and Rajaoree was a necessary preliminary. The Sikh army defeated the confederated chiefs with great loss, and Runjeet, pushing his success, occupied both Bimbur and Rajaoree in the early part of November, and received the submission of the discomfited Mahomedan chiefs of both places. The rest of the confederates were compelled to fly into Cashmere, where they were received by the governor, Ata Mahomed.

Futeh Khan, the vuzeer of Shah Muhmud, was at this time upon the Indus, whither he had come to punish the two brothers, who held Attock and Cashmere, for the assistance they had rendered to Shah Shuja, and to recover the two provinces for Cabul. He had sent forward a detachment of 8,000 Afghans to Rotas, and was already planning operations against Ata Mahomed of Cashmere, when Runjeet obtained his successes against the Bimbur and Rajaoree chiefs. It became essential that, engaged as the Lahore and Cabul forces were so closely upon the same field, the two leaders should come to a mutual explanation of their views and intentions; accordingly Runjeet Singh sent agents with an overture for this purpose, and invited the vuzeer to an interview upon the Jelum, in order that they might concert a joint expedition against Cashmere. Futeh Khan being no less desirous to come to an understanding with the Sikh, the meeting took place on the 1st December, when it was settled that Runjeet should place a force, under his dewan Mohkum Chund, at the vuzeer's disposal in the expedition he meditated, and should give every facility for the passage into Cashmere, by the passes of Rajaoree, which he had recently subdued. The aid of a detachment of Afghans, to be employed afterwards against Multan, and a share of the plunder of Cashmere, were the returns stipulated for this succour. Runjeet desired a portion of the revenues of the valley, but the politic vuzeer objected to any participation in the permanent resources of the province, and preferred agreeing to a nuzurana of nine lakhs from the spoil expected. Having on these terms secured the assistance of 12,000 Sikhs, under the Dewan Mohkum Chund, the vuzeer proceeded on his expedition, and the joint armies commenced their march, while Runjeet returned to Lahore. A heavy fall of snow impeded their progress, and the Sikhs, being less inured to the severities of a mountain winter than the northern troops, were outstripped by the vuzeer; who, penetrating into the valley in February, drove Ata Mahomed from his stockades, and in a short time reduced him to submission, and obtained all the strongholds in the province, without receiving much assistance from Mohkum Chund and the Sikhs.

Runjeet made great rejoicings at Lahore on receiving news of this success, treating the operation as a joint one, tending equally to his own as to the vuzeer's glory. A deep intrigue was, however, in progress, which the issue of the Cashmere expedition brought immediately to light. Juhan Dad Khan, the governor of Attock, despairing, after his brother's defeat in Cashmere, of his own ability to resist the vuzeer single-handed, and knowing he had little favour to expect from him, had previously placed himself in correspondence with Runjeet Singh, to whom he promised the fort of Attock for a jagir, in case he should be reduced to extremity. Runjeet, accordingly, when he returned to Lahore, left a detachment under Dya Singh in the vicinity of the Indus, to be ready to occupy that important fortress whenever it should be given up. In March, 1813, Runjeet heard that his officer had been admitted, and that the place was held and administered in his name. He accordingly lost no time in reinforcing the detachment, with a strong convoy, containing every thing necessary to place the fort in a complete state of defence, and Devi Das and Hakim Uzeez-ud-Deen were sent as commissioners to settle the country surrounding, which formed the dependency of Attock. Futeh Khan Vuzeer cried out against this usurpation, and deeming himself absolved by it from the conditions upon which he had obtained the co-operation of the Sikhs under the dewan, he dismissed them without any share of the booty obtained; and then nominating his brother, Uzeem Khan, governor in Cashmere, he marched to Attock, and made upon Runjeet a demand for its surrender. This was spun out into a negotiation—and, of course, evaded by the Sikh.

With the dewan Mohkum Chund, Shah Shuja came to Lahore, where a demand was immediately made upon him, and upon his principal wife, to surrender the famous diamond, called koh-i-noor or ‘hill of light,’ a jagir being promised with a fort as the condition of compliance. The Shah denied that he had it, and the Vufa Begum declared it had been placed in pawn with a mahajun to obtain supplies for the Shah in his distresses. Runjeet, disbelieving these assertions, placed guards round the Shah's residence, and allowed no access or egress without strict search. The exiled family, however, being proof against the severity of mere restraint, the prohibition of food was added, and for two days the Shah, with his wives, family, and servants, suffered absolute deprivation; but their firmness was even proof against this trial, and Runjeet, from a regard to his own reputation, determined to proceed with more art, and ordered food to be supplied. On the 1st of April, there were produced in his durbar two notes, purporting to be from the Shah to Futeh Khan Vuzeer, and to other Afghan chiefs, descriptive of his sufferings, and praying for their efforts for his deliverance. These were stated to have been intercepted, but were generally believed to have been fabricated. It was now assumed to be indispensable to take precautions against the intrigues and machinations of the Shah, and a guard of two companies of Sikhs, from the newly-raised corps, being added to that previously set over the premises where he resided, threats of a transfer of the Shah's person to Govindgurb, with treatment of the most galling and injurious kind, were resorted to, in order to enforce compliance with the demand for the jewel. Having tried remonstrance in vain, the Shah next resorted to artifice, and solicited two months' delay, to enable him to procure the diamond from certain mahajuns with whom it was asserted to be pledged, and he said that some lakhs of rupees must be expended to effect this. Runjeet reluctantly consented to allow the time solicited, and severities were accordingly suspended for a season. They were renewed, however, before the period expired, and Shah Shuja, wearied out by them, and seeing that the rapacity of the Sikh would not hesitate even at the sacrifice of his life for its gratification, agreed at last to give up the precious jewel.* Accordingly, on the 1st of June, Runjeet waited on the Shah, with a few attendants, to receive it. He was received by the exiled prince with much dignity, and both being seated, a pause and solemn silence ensued, which continued for nearly an hour. Runjeet then, getting impatient, whispered to one of his attendants to remind the Shah of the object of his coming. No answer was returned, but the Shah with his eyes made the signal to an eunuch, who retired, and brought in a small roll, which he set down on the carpet at equal distance between the chiefs. Runjeet desired Bhooanee Das to unfold the roll, when the diamond was exhibited, and recognized, and the Sikh immediately retired with his prize in hand. The Shah was now left more at liberty, his guard being withdrawn: a letter was, however, intercepted a few days after from Kazee Sher Mahomed, one of his followers, to Mahomed Uzeem Khan, the new governor of Cashmere, containing a proposition to assassinate Runjeet Singh, and advising the vuzeer Futeh Khan to make a simultaneous attack on Lahore. The Sikh sent for one of the princes of the exiled family, and through him transmitted the letter, with its writer, who had been seized, to the Shah. The ex-king sent both back, begging of Runjeet to punish the kazee as he might deem fitting. In the idea, that a confession of the Shah's privity would be extorted, the guard on duty were desired to beat the kazee with their shoes and with sticks. He fainted under the blows, declaring, however, to the last, his master's entire innocence. He was then committed to prison, whence Shah Shuja, after a time, purchased his release by a payment of 20,000 rupees.

* This diamond was one of those described by Tavernier, as adorning the peacock throne at Delhi. It is the largest known to exist, and is by Hindus supposed to have belonged to the Pandus of mythological celebrity, before it fell into the hands of the Mogul sovereigns. It is nearly an inch and a half in length, and an inch wide, and rises half an inch from its gold setting. Nadir Shah robbed the Delhi family of it, and Ahmed Shah Abdali got possession of it in the pillage of Nadir Shah's tents, after his assassination.

Cashmere, had sat down before Attock, and pending the negotiation at Lahore, upon his demand for its surrender, closely blockaded the fort. Dewan Mohkum Chund had been sent to the vicinity, and in the beginning of July, intelligence was received from him, that the garrison was reduced to such straits for supplies, that, unless very shortly relieved, they must surrender. Runjeet held a council upon this, and it was determined to relieve the fort, even at the risk of the attempt producing hostilities with the vuzeer. Orders to this effect were accordingly sent immediately to the dewan, who, being encamped at Boorhan, marched at break of day, on the 12th July, 1813, to execute them. On that day, he made a short march to an outpost on a rivulet, held by a piquet of the vuzeer's army, which retired in the night. The dewan marched again next morning leisurely along the rivulet, that his men might drink, and be always fresh for action, the weather being extremely hot. At ten in the morning, he came to the Indus, at about five miles from the fort. The Cabul army was here drawn up to oppose his further advance, its van being composed of a body of Moolkea Musulmans, supported by a body of cavalry under the since celebrated Dost Mahomed Khan. The dewan took up his ground, forming his cavalry in four divisions, and the only battalion of infantry that had yet come up, in square. The Moolkeas immediately made a resolute charge on the battalion, but were received with so heavy a rolling fire as to be driven back with severe loss. The dewan ordered up for the support of his battalion some fresh troops and artillery, under Ghousee Khan, which had come in sight; but his order was not obeyed. Dost Mahomed now attacked with his horse, and the Sikhs were sinking before him, when the dewan, in person, on his elephant, carried up two guns, which, discharging grape, checked the Afghans. By this time it was noon; the heat of the sun had become intense, and a strong hot wind blew the dust into the faces of the Afghans. Under these disadvantages, the vuzeer did not think proper to carry the troops he had in reserve into action, and those who had been engaged being exhausted, the battle ceased. The vuzeer retired across the Indus to Peshawur, leaving the dewan free to relieve the fort, which having effected, Mohkum Chund returned to Lahore in August, to receive the reward of his service, and to prefer his complaint against the officers, whose disobedience had so nearly proved fatal. They received the punishment attaching to correspondence with the enemy, which was detected as the motive of their so critically holding back from the action.

Toward the close of the rains of 1813, Runjeet commenced preparation for an expedition into Cashmere. In October he visited Juwala Mookhee and Kangra, and thence marched by Seal-Kot and Vuzeerabad to the Jelum, where he summoned all his jagirdars, and all the tributary hill chiefs, to be in attendance with their respective quotas. Strict muster was taken of each party as it arrived, and fines were imposed if the number was short, or the equipment in any respect deficient. Great preparation had also been made to bring an effective artillery into the field, and to improve that mounted on camels, and the whole having been reviewed, Runjeet Singh, on the 11th November, crossed the Jelum, and entered the town of Rotas. The vuzeer Futteh Khan was brought from Peshawur by these preparations to the Derajat, on the west bank of the Indus, which circumstance, added to intelligence, that the snow lay still deep on the Pir-Panjâl mountains, induced Runjeet to suspend his proposed expedition until the following spring. He accordingly sent a detachment to occupy and seize the passes in the hills beyond Rajaoree, and to select places for grain and store-depôts, and then returned by Rotas to Lahore, where he arrived on the 26th of December.

The confiscation of the hill territory of Huripur, and its annexation to the Lahore Khalsa (fisc), was the first act which marked the return of the Sikh ruler to his capital. Bhoop Singh, the raja, whose treacherous seizure and confinement preceded the confiscation, received on its completion a small jagir for subsistence. The next act of Runjeet Singh was more shamelessly extortionate. Hearing that Shah Shuja had still some jewels of rare value, a demand was made for them ; and, on the Shah's declaring that he had none left, the Sikh determined to judge for himself, and sending Bhya Ram Singh, with a party of females, to search the interior apartments, caused to be brought into his presence every box or packet the Shah possessed. The Shah's head eunuch was then made to open them, and Runjeet seized and retained for himself all the most precious articles, with the swords, pistols, and two cart-loads of carpets, and women's dresses. The Shah was then ordered to remove from the Shahleamar garden and palace to a common house in the city, and was subjected there to strict surveillance. After experiencing every kind of indignity and discomfort, he determined to attempt an escape with his family. Towards the end of November, it was reported to Runjeet, that the begums of Shah Shuja were missing, whereupon the Shah's person was placed under a guard, and alternate threats and promises were employed to induce him to declare where they were gone. He denied all knowledge of their motions or intentions. The city was searched, and egress forbidden to all veiled women, and all merchants having property of the Shah's, or of any members of his family, in deposit, were ordered to surrender it into the Sikh treasury. These precautions were, however, taken too late. It was ascertained that the begums had left the house of Shah Shuja in the dress of Hindu females, and thence had been conveyed to the banking house of Baluk Ram, the agent or correspondent of Soogun Chund, a great banker at Delhi, and treasurer of the British residency there; that by him they had been assisted in passing out of the city, and provided with the means of making their way to Lodiana, where they had arrived safely, and making themselves known to Captain Birch, the assistant, in temporary charge of the station, were received with hospitality and attention. Baluk Ram was seized by Runjeet, and compelled to shew his books, and render up all property in his possession belonging to the Shah or his family. He received, however, no further punishment.

In April, 1815, Shah Shuja himself made his escape in disguise. His guard was disgraced, and a reward offered for recovery of the prisoner, who succeeded in reaching the hills, where he was hospitably received by the petty Raja of Kishtewar. Here he collected a body of 3,000 men, and in the winter season made an attempt on Cashmere: but the cold prevented his passing the Pir-Panjal range, and his troops dispersed. His condition was now desperate, but after a long and circuitous journey over the Kooloo mountains, with few attendants, and fewer comforts, he at last, in September, 1816, joined his family at Lodiana, and placed himself under the protection of the British government. A provision of 50,000 rs. per annum was assigned for the maintenance of the Shah in his exile, while he might remain in the British territory. He was afterwards joined at Lodiana by his sightless brother, Shah Zeman, whom with his family already in abject poverty, Runjeet took no trouble to detain. To this prince a separate allowance of 24,000 rs. per annum was assigned.

The chronological order of events has been somewhat anticipated, in order to bring the misfortunes of these princes into one connected relation. The first expedition of Runjeet against Cashmere will take us back into the year 1814. The events, however, which preceded or attended it, will more fitly form the subject of another chapter.

CHAPTER XIII.

RUNJEET SINGH, having celebrated the Hooli, and bathed at Amritsur, moved his army, in April, 1814, into the hill country about Kangra, to enforce the collection of his tributes, and the personal attendance of the rajas with their contingents. Having thus strengthened himself with a large body of hill-men, he moved to Bimbur on the 4th June; and, advancing slowly from thence, was met by Agur Khan, the chief of Rajaoree, through whose territory lay the route to Cashmere. On the 11th June, the army arrived at Rajaoree, and disencumbering itself of heavy baggage, was equipped for mountain movements, preparatory to the passage of the famous Fir-Panjal range. An attempt had been made to gain the Poonch raja, Rooh-ullah Khan, to the Sikh cause; but he pleaded engagements with Cashmere, and the presence of his son as a hostage with Uzeem Khan, the governor. After a consultation of the principal officers, however, it was determined, nevertheless, that the main army, commanded by Runjeet in person, should pursue the Poonch route, and endeavour to penetrate by the Toshu Mydan pass, while a strong diversion should be made by Buhramgulla (or Baramulla), towards Soopyn, in the valley.

The cavalry being dismounted, and every man furnished with provisions for three days, a detachment was formed and sent forward, on the 15th June, under Ram Dyal, a grandson of Mohkum Chund Dewan, with whom were Dul Singh and other jagirdars. They appeared before the post at Buhramgulla on the 18th, and after a little negotiation, obtained possession of the pass, on payment to the defenders of the arrears due to them by the Poonch raja. Heavy rain set in on the 20th June, and the Sikh army beginning to suffer from the wet and cold, and the supplies already running short, the march of the main body was delayed until the 26th. On the 28th, however, Runjeet reached Poonch, and found it evacuated; the raja having given orders to his people to attempt no resistance, but to desert their towns and villages, to bury or remove the grain, and to hover in small parties on the flanks of the invaders. The consequences of this system had already begun to be felt, and compelled a halt at Poonch, for further supplies, until the 13th July. Thence advancing by Mundee, Runjeet reached Toshu Mydan on the 18th, where he found Mahomed Uzeem Khan, with the forces of Cashmere, drawn up to oppose his progress. The Sikh army took up its position in face of the enemy, and remained for some days inactive. Here Runjeet received intelligence from the detachment at Buhramgulla. On the 19th July, Ram Dyal and the jagirdars ascended the Pir-Panjal mountains, by the Surae and Mudpoor pass, driving before them the Cashmere troops left to defend it. Runjeet was uneasy at this precipitancy, thinking his detachment out of reach of support, and liable to be overpowered; he sent off immediately, therefore, a reinforcement under Bhya Ram Singh. The Rajaoree chief recommended an attack of Uzeem Khan, as the best means of preventing his undertaking any thing against the detachment; but Runjeet, having reconnoitred the position, deemed the attack too hazardous. It is probably the only thing that would have prevented the disasters which followed.

In the mean time, Ram Dyal, having passed the mountain barrier, and debouched upon the valley at Heerapur, was attacked, on the 22nd July, by a party sent against him by Uzeem Khan. The Cashmerians were defeated and followed to Soopyn. On the 24th, Ram Dyal assaulted the town; but it was well defended by Shukoor Khan, and the assailants were repulsed; whereupon the Sikhs retired again to the Pir-Panjal mountains, to wait for reinforcements. Bhya Ram Singh, hearing of this discomfiture, deemed it necessary to halt at Buhramgulla, with the support he was bringing up, in order to secure the pass.

Mahomed Uzeem Khan, seeing matters in this critical position, thought the time favourable for offensive operations against the main army, which had already suffered much from sickness, and more from desertion. On the 29th of July, Roohullah Khan, the Poonch chief, approached, and commenced a desultory fire on the Sikh position. On the following morning, he renewed his attack with more vigour, and Runjeet was compelled to fall back on Mundee. Being pursued thither, he fired the town, and, directing his disciplined battalions to cover the retreat, continued his retrograde march to Poonch, which he reached on the 31st of July, with the loss of many men, and his principal officer, Mit Singh Buhraana, and stripped of nearly all his baggage. The army was now no longer in a state of organization or discipline, and, setting fire to Poonch, Runjeet quitted the camp and continued his flight to Bhoohi, whence he with a few attendants took the nearest route to Lahore, which he reached on the 12th of August.

Ram Dyal and the jagirdars serving with him, in the detachment which had penetrated into the valley, were surrounded, and their supplies were cut off; but the detachment was allowed by Uzeem Khan to retire, and was furnished with a safe conduct to the Sikh frontier, in consideration of the friendship professed by this governor for Dewan Mohkum Chund, its commandant's grandfather. That distinguished officer of Runjeet Singh had himself been prevented by indisposition from taking part in the expedition. He warned his master, however, of the difficulties he must expect if he allowed himself to be overtaken in the hills by the rainy season, and particularly pointed out the necessity of providing large depôts in Bimbur and Rajaoree, in anticipation of a determined opposition from the Musulman chief, and the whole population of Poonch. All had happened exactly as he predicted, and the ruler of Lahore returned to lament the want of his Dewan's experience and judgment, no less than of his tried skill and valour, in this important expedition. The illness, however, which prevented him from accompanying the Sikh army increased, and in the course of October, soon after the return of Runjeet to Lahore, he died, amidst the regrets and lamentations of all well-wishers to the power of the Sikhs, and to the dominion of Runjeet Singh. In his private character the Dewan was liberal, upright, and high-minded; he enjoyed the confidence of the troops placed under his command, and was popular and much respected amongst the entire Sikh community.

The losses sustained by Runjeet in this expedition required some time to repair. The Sikh army was not, therefore, in a condition to take the field at the close of the Dussera of 1814, as usual; but in April, 1815, a force was employed, under Ram Dyal and Dul Singh, ravaging the Multan and Bahawulpur territories, and exacting tributes and contributions in that neighbourhood. Runjeet himself passed the hot weather at Adenanugur, raising and disciplining new battalions; and especially recruiting men of the Goorkha nation, of whose valour he began to entertain a very high opinion, from having watched the operations which, during the season, had passed in the hill country east of the Sutluj. The British Government had engaged in hostilities with the Goorkhas, and Colonel (afterwards General) Ochterlony had taken the field there against Umur Singh, who, for six months, maintained himself at Ramgurh and Maloun, and baffled the known skill and superior forces of this experienced commander. His final discomfiture, and the dispossession of the Goorkhas from all the hill territory west of the Gogra or Kalee river, occasioned a breaking up of their power, which was highly favourable to Runjeet's views, and procured him many men of this nation particularly well adapted for hill warfare.

In the mean time, the defeat of the Sikh expedition against Cashmere encouraged the Musulman chiefs of Bimbur and Rajaoree to break out into rebellion, and towards the close of the year 1814, the son of the latter, who was detained as a hostage at Lahore, effected his escape and joined his father. The Bimbur insurgents were headed by the brother of Sooltan Khan, who, since he made his submission in 1813, had been himself detained by Runjeet Singh, and was now a close prisoner at Lahore.

In October, after the Dussera of 1815, the Sikh army was called out, and its rendezvous for muster appointed at Sealkot. A division was sent in advance under Ram Dyal and Dul Singh to punish the Bimbur and Rajaoree chiefs, and to ravage their territories with fire and sword. Poonch was saved from a similar visitation by its greater elevation, and by the setting in of winter with severity. Runjeet was not yet prepared for an attempt to retrieve his fortune and lost reputation, by another expedition against Cashmere. He was content, therefore, to employ the season in confirming his authority in the hills before subdued, and in punishing the disobedient and refractory rajas and chiefs on this side the Pir-Panjal range. He returned to Lahore on the 28th December, where he was waited upon by Beer Singh, the Raja of Noorpur, in the hills, who had failed to attend the summons to rendezvous at Sealkot. A heavy mulct was imposed, which being beyond the chief's means, he offered his thakoors, or household gods, of silver and gold, in pawn; but, these not sufficing, he was arrested at the door of the durbar, or hall of audience, on the 20th January, 1816, and next day was sent off in a palkee to witness the seizure and confiscation of his all, and to render an account to the sequestrators. He declined the petty jagir offered to him for subsistence, and, after a fruitless attempt to recover his fortress and territory by force, took refuge within the British territory. A second example was made of the Raja of Juswoul, Omed Singh, for a similar failure. Being stripped of his possessions, however, he accepted the jagir tendered.

After completing his arrangements in the hills, Runjeet, having bathed at Turun-Tarun, moved with his army into the territories of Multan and Bahawulpur, where the still unripe crops and abundant herds presented the means of enforcing contributions or inflicting irremediable injury. The Sikh detachments penetrated down the Indus, to the verge of the Sinde territory, and Mahomed Khan, chief of Bukur and Leah, of the family ejected by the meers of Sinde, having recently died, a demand of tribute was made on his successor, Hafiz Ahmed Khan. On his refusal, his forts, Khangurh and Muhmudkot, were occupied, and Phoola Singh Akali was allowed to perpetrate there atrocities and insults to the Mahomedan population of the most revolting description. Hafiz Ahmed soon after paid down a sum of money to procure the withdrawing of the Sikh garrisons, and thus recovered his forts, with part also of the plunder extorted. Ahmed Khan, of Jhung, was now summoned to the presence, and called upon for a large contribution. On pleading inability, he was sent prisoner to Lahore, while three battalions proceeded to occupy and annex to the Khalsa the whole of his possessions, reckoned to yield about four lakhs of yearly revenue. They were farmed to Lala Sookh-Dyal for 1,60,000 rupees. Futeh Singh Aloowala was at the same time employed in seizing Ooch and Kot-Maharaja, the first held by Syuds, who had hitherto been respected, and were now provided with a jagir; and the second by a chief named Rujub Ali Khan, who was sent prisoner to Lahore.

Runjeet Singh returned from the southwest, and re-entered his capital on the 20th May. Here he learned that the Vuzeer Futeh Khan had employed the season in a march across the Pukholee and Dumtour hills, into Cashmere, where he aided his brother in enforcing the collections, and establishing his authority in the valley, and then returned by the same route. The Sikh detachment, under Ram Dyal and Dul Singh, had remained upon the frontier to watch his motions.

A domestic matter now occupied the attention of Runjeet. His second wife, the mother of Koonwur Khuruk Singh, was accused of scandalous improprieties, and particularly, of too notorious and close an intimacy with Bhya Ram Singh, the Koonwur's dewan. Runjeet had lavished much territory in jagir upon the heir-apparent, and the management was undertaken by his mother and the dewan, upon the usual condition of maintaining an efficient contingent of horse for service with the Sikh army. Complaint, however, was loud and frequent, that the jagirs were the scene of extortion and mismanagement, while the condition and equipment of the Koonwur's contingent was deemed by Runjeet highly discreditable. He first endeavoured to procure a reform by exciting the pride of his son, who was of age to take an interest in such things; but the influence of the mother and dewan preventing any amendment, the Sikh ruler was at length compelled to interfere more authoritatively. The Dewan Ram Singh was thrown into confinement, and ordered to account for his stewardship of the jagirs, and the Koonwur's mother was directed to fix her residence in the fort of Shekhoopur. Khuruk Singh was reprimanded for allowing such proceedings; and Bhooanee Das, of Peshawur, was assigned to him as a new dewan. Several lakhs of rupees, and some valuable jewels, were extorted from Ram Singh, whose banker, Ootum Chund, of Amritsur, was also called to account, and made to refund what he held for the ex-dewan.

After the Dussera in October, Runjeet's first journey was into the hills, where he paid a visit to Raja Sunsar Chund, at Nadoun, and collected his yearly tributes; thence returning, he effected the confiscation of the jagirs and territories of Beer Singh and Dewan Singh, two brothers of the late Jodh Singh Ramgurhea, valued at five lakhs of rupees yearly revenue. The persons of both chiefs were seized, as they came to the durbar to pay their respects, without suspicion that any design against them was entertained by the Lahore ruler. Amritsur was illuminated for the return of its sovereign, on the 13th of December.

The constitution of Runjeet, though it must have been excellent to have carried him so long through a course of life consisting of alternate toils and debaucheries, each extreme in degree, began now to yield to these incessant trials. His digestion failed, and with loss of strength, thinness of body and incapacity for much exertion were superinduced. Towards the commencement of 1817 his health was seriously impaired, and he submitted to a course of regimen prescribed by his native physicians, which continued for forty days, but produced in the end little permanent benefit. No military enterprise or other active operation was undertaken in this year. The Sikh ruler's principal source of anxiety, in the course of it, arose from an attachment to Ram Lal, the brother of his chamberlain, Khooshal Singh, upon whom such unlimited bounties had been lavished, and who had become the great court favourite, and the bottle companion of his master. Ram Lal could not be induced by the most seductive offers to give up his Bra-minical thread, and adopt the Sikh ritual and customs, as his brother had done. In order to avoid further importunity on the subject, he fled to his home east of the Sutluj, where he was beyond the reach of the Lahore ruler, who, provoked that he should have escaped, wreaked a real or pretended vengeance on his chamberlain, by removing him from office, and placing him under restraint. Ram Lal returned for his brother's sake, and ultimately received the pahal, or Sikh initiation, and changed his name to Ram Singh.

The following season was employed in preparation for an expedition against Multan, of which the resources had been annually drained by forced contributions, ravage, and waste, so as to lead Runjeet to hope that Mozuffur Khan's means of defence and preparation were now so impaired, as to make the city and fort an easy conquest. Before undertaking this enterprise, however, Runjeet gave liberty to Ahmed Khan, of Jhung, whom he had held in close confinement for nine months. A small jagir was assigned to him for subsistence. The Sikh army had been ordered to rendezvous, in the beginning of the year 1818, on the south-west frontier of the Sikh dominion. Koonwur Khuruk Singh was now appointed to the nominal command, aided by Misur Dewan Chund, who had risen by his merit and activity from a low situation to be commandant of the artillery, and who undertook to reduce the fort of Multan, if vested with the chief command during the siege. The jealousy of the jagirdars, who objected to serve under a man of yesterday, obliged Runjeet to adopt the plan of sending his heir-apparent in nominal command of the whole.

All the boats on the Ravi and Chenab were put in requisition to carry supplies and stores for the army, and the march was commenced in January, 1818. A demand was made of an exorbitant sum in cash and of five of Mozuffur Khan's best horses, and this not being immediately complied with, his two forts of Mozuffurgurh and Khangurh were stormed and taken. In the course of February, the city of Multan was occupied, and its citadel closely invested, without much loss. The approaches were made according to no consistent plan, but every jagirdar and chief erected his own battery, and a promiscuous fire was kept up from guns and small arms against every part of the defences. The means of the garrison were, however, so deficient, that even under this irregular method of attack, the wall of the citadel was, by the continual fire kept up, breached in several places, and the upper works and defences were nearly demolished in the course of the month of April. In May the approaches were carried close to the dhool-kot, or fausse braye of the works, and the army became eager to be led to the storm; but Runjeet, who, though absent, regulated every thing connected with the siege, forbade any risk being run, and continued his offer to the Nuwab of a jagir, if he would surrender. He was obstinate in his refusal, and seemed determined to hold out to the last extremity. While matters continued in this state, an Akali fanatic, named Sadhoo Singh (drugged, it is said, with opium), on the 2nd of June, advanced without orders, with a few companions, and attacked, sword in hand, the Afghans in the dhool-kot, who, being at the time asleep or negligent, were overpowered. The men in the Sikh trenches, seeing this, advanced simultaneously, on the impulse of the moment, to support the attack, and the entire outwork was carried with a slaughter of those defending it. Flushed with this success, the assailants attempted the fort, and found ready entrance by the breaches made, the garrison not expecting assault, nor being prepared for a consistent and determined resistance. The citadel was thus suddenly carried, Mozuffur Khan, with his four sons and household, made a final stand at the door of his residence, but fell covered with wounds. Two of his sons, Shah Nuwaz Khan and Huq Nuwaz, were also killed on the spot, and a third was left badly wounded. Surfuraz Khan, the fourth, who had been vested by his father with the government under himself, was found in a vault, or cellar, and taken prisoner. The citadel was now sacked, and an immense booty fell to the troops engaged in the assault. Runjeet Singh, however, was not content that his treasury should be defrauded of the wealth known to have been laid up in this citadel, and which he had long coveted and hoped to have secured by a surrender on capitulation. He accordingly issued peremptory orders for the immediate return of the whole army to Lahore, with the exception of a detachment under Jodh Singh Kulsea, of sufficient strength to hold the place, and conduct the local administration. Sookh Dyal, who had taken the farm of Jhung, as above stated, was nominated to the civil government. Upon the arrival of the army at Lahore, proclamation was made, that the plunder of Multan was the property of the state, and all soldiers, officers, or jagirdars, possessing any article of spoil, or any money obtained in the sack of the fort, were ordered to bring the same in, and to account for the whole to the treasury, under penalty of heavy mulct, or confinement. It affords a strong proof of the awe, in which the power and sources of information possessed by Runjeet Singh, were held by his troops, that this order produced no outrage or general resistance. Most of the spoil was traced and collected for the treasury, and, though rendered up with much discontent, and with many efforts at concealment, still the severities practised on the obstinate, and the mutual jealousies and envy of their fellows, felt by those who had been compelled to disgorge, led generally to the discovery of all that was valuable; so that the toshuk-khana, or jewel-office, of the Lahore ruler, was enriched by this re-spoliation of the troops. There is but one example of similar audacity in a commander, and that was the terrible Nadir Shah, who, upon his return from India, when his army was crossing the Attock, placed a guard at the ferry, and as every one came over, searched his person and baggage, for every article of the spoil of Delhi, that the soldiers or followers of his army might have secured.

Surfuraz Khan, and his wounded brother, Zoolfikar Khan, were conducted to Lahore, where Runjeet assigned them a small stipend for subsistence. The capture of Multan was the only operation of the season, the whole Sikh army having been employed against the place since January, and the rains having set in as it fell. During that season, Govind Chund, Raja of Datarpur, in the hills, dying, his territory was annexed to the Khalsa, and his son was held in durance until he consented to accept a jagir.

This season of necessary inactivity produced, however, another event of great influence on the future fortune of Runjeet Singh. In the month of August, 1818, the vuzeer Futteh Khan, whose energy and talents had raised Shah Mahmud to the throne of Cabul, and who alone kept together the turbulent and discordant materials of which the Afghan empire had been composed, was plotted against by the Prince Kamran, the son of Mahmud, and, being treacherously seized, was first blinded, and soon after put to death by his order. The vuzeer had fifty brothers, all at the head of governments, or otherwise in the possession of power and wealth, and the cry to vengeance was general throughout the kingdom. Mahomed Uzeem posted from Cashmere, leaving a younger brother, Jubur Khan, in the valley. Taking the direction of the measures of resistance organized, he defeated the troops of Kamran, and dislodged his garrisons from the neighbourhood of Cabul, Ghuzni, and Candahar, so that in a few months the authority of the weak Shah Mahmud, and his rash, ill-advised son, was confined to the city and plain of Herat, and the rest of the Afghan territory was assumed and portioned out in separate governments and independent principalities, by the powerful members of this extensive family. The plea put forward by Kamran for his conduct towards the vuzeer Futteh Khan, was, his having plundered the property of Feroz-ud-deen, a prince of the blood royal, whom he expelled from the government of Herat, in order to recover it for Mahmud. The real cause, however, was jealousy of his power and reputation, and the vain conceit entertained by Kamran, that the vuzeer's abilities could be dispensed with, and affairs conducted as well by the household and family of the imbecile nominal sovereign.

mined Runjeet to carry his army across the Indus in the ensuing season, more especially as a detachment of Sikhs had recently been overpowered by the Khutuk Musulmans, and every motive of policy required that this should not pass unrevenged. The troops, having been called out in October, advanced to Attock, under Runjeet's personal command, and the river being forded with some loss, the fortress of Khyrabad, with Jugheera, and the territory on the opposite bank, were reduced and occupied. No immediate resistance was offered; Feroz Khan, the chief of the Khutuk tribe, made his submission, and Runjeet, having ascertained that no organized force was in the field to oppose him, directed an advance on Peshawur. The city was entered on the 20th November, Yar Mahomed Khan, the governor, retiring, as the Sikhs advanced, into the mountains occupied by the Yusuf-zai tribes of Afghans.

Runjeet Singh remained with his army three days in Peshawur, and then returned, leaving as governor on his behalf, Juhan Dad Khan, to whose treachery he was indebted for the possession of Attock, but whom he had left unrewarded hitherto, and without the promised jagir. He furnished him, however, with neither troops, nor money, to maintain the possession. Accordingly, the Sikh army had no sooner crossed the Indus on its return, than Yar Mahomed came down from the mountains with the Yusufzais, and expelled the Sikh governor: Juhan Dad Khan fled to the southward, and there fell in with Shah Shuja, whom the state of affairs in Cabul had tempted from Lodiana again to try his fortune. From him he received a free pardon, and joined his standard. The curse of Fate was, however, on every enterprise undertaken by this prince, whose character, though amiable in many respects, and irreproachable in all, possessed not the energy to inspire awe and attach followers in troubled times, or to give confidence to those disposed otherwise to favour his cause. Shah Shuja returned destitute to Lodiana, after a few months of vain wandering, and fruitless negotiation with the Meers of Sinde, and other quondam tributaries and dependants of the Afghan empire ; and Juhan Dad Khan then made his peace with the court of Herat, and proceeded thither, despairing of obtaining favour or advancement at that of Lahore.

CHAPTER XIV.

IN February and March, 1819, Desa Singh Majhitea was employed by Runjeet Singh, with Raja Sunsar Chund, in collecting the hill tributes. In the course of their operations they came in contact with the Raja of Kuhlur, whose capital, Belaspur, is on the British side of the Sutluj, but who held at that time extensive possessions north and west of that river. This chief refusing the tribute demanded, Desa Singh marched to occupy his territory, and having dispossessed him of all he held on the right bank of the boundary river of British protection, sent a detachment across it against Belaspur. Captain Ross, the political agent in the adjoining hills, and commandant of a battalion of Goorkha light troops, stationed at Subathoo, marched immediately to the point threatened, and was joined there by a detachment from Lodiana, ordered out by the resident at Delhi. This promptitude alarmed the Sikh ruler, and Desa Singh was ordered not only to recall his detachment, but to wait upon Captain Ross, and offer every explanation and apology in his power.

Nothing material occurred in the early part of this year, but the season was occupied in preparation for a second expedition against Cashmere. To this Runjeet Singh was encouraged partly by his recent success against Multan, which had given him confidence in his troops, and had added largely to their reputation, but mainly by the state of the Afghan power, and the knowledge, that Mahomed Uzeem Khan was absent and had carried with him the most efficient troops in the valley, to forward his other designs. Misur Dewan Chund, the conqueror of Multan, was selected by Runjeet to command the present expedition, the Sikh ruler being determined to remain within his own frontier, influenced partly by his bodily infirmities, partly by a superstitious notion that fortune and fate were against his personal success in the valley, but mainly perhaps by the knowledge, that the more important task of expediting supplies, and supporting the armies operating in advance, could best be performed by himself.

In the month of April, the Sikh army marched towards the frontier, and a select and strong division was formed there, under the Misur's command, to lead the advance. A second army, to support this officer, was placed under the command of Koonwur Khuruk Singh; while Runjeet kept with himself a reserve, to be employed as occasion might require in expediting stores and supplies.

By the beginning of June, Misur Dewan Chund had occupied Rajaoree and Poonch, and all the hills and passes south of the Pir-Panjal range. The supporting division was accordingly advanced to Rajaoree, to keep open the communications. The chief of this last place was in rebellion, and acting with the Raja of Poonch in the defence of the Pir-Panjal passes. Runjeet, however, had given liberty to Sooltan Khan, of Bimbur, after a confinement of seven years, and had secured his advice and co-operation, by holding out hopes of extensive benefit to him from the success of the enterprise. On the 23rd June, the Misur attacked the Rajaoree and Poonch rajas, in their position at the Dhaki Deo and Maja passes, and carried them, thus securing to himself a road over the Pir-Panjal. Khuruk Singh, with his division, advanced now to Surdee Thana, and Runjeet, with his reserves, came up as far as Bimbur, while Misur Dewan Chund, crossing the barrier mountains, descended into the valley, and took up a position at Surai Ali, on the road to Soopyn.

Jubur Khan, who had been left by Mahomed Uzeem governor in Cashmere, was at Soopyn, with 5,000 men, to make his stand for possession of the valley. The troops he had, however, were raw, and unable to compete with the disciplined battalions led by Misur Dewan Chund, which besides outnumbered them greatly. On the 5th July, having been furnished with supplies and reinforcements from the rear, the Misur advanced to Soopyn, and immediately on coming in view of the Cashmerian army, ordered an attack, which, after a few hours of smart fighting, attended with considerable loss on both sides, was completely successful. The Afghans and troops of Jubur Khan fled at once across the mountains, towards the Indus, leaving the valley to be occupied without further opposition by the victorious army of Runjeet Singh. Great was the joy of this chief at his success. The cities of Lahore and of Amritsur were illuminated for three nights, and Motee Ram, son of the late Dewan Mohkum Chund, was sent as governor of the valley, accompanied by a strong body of troops, for the reduction of Derbend and other strongholds ; and with instructions to spare no effort to bring the Poonch and Rajaoree chiefs to make their submission.

The arrangements consequent upon the subjugation of Cashmere occupied Runjeet for the remainder of the year 1819. Towards its close, the Sikh army was again called out, and led by him in person to Multan, whence operations were directed for ravaging the territories of the Nuwab of Bahawulpur, and southward as far as Bukur, belonging to the Meers of Sinde, with a view to extort augmented tribute and contributions. Dera Ghazee Khan, on the west bank of the Indus, was at the same time wrested from its governor, Zeman Khan, and, in the settlement made with the Bahawulpur chief, the place was given to him in farm at a heavy rent.

Runjeet returned to Lahore in April, 1820, bringing with him a horse of high repute, that he had extorted from Hafiz Ahmed Khan of Munkera. Many subsequent enterprises were undertaken for similar animals; the love for them, and the desire to possess all of any repute for excellence, being a growing passion carried by the Sikh chief almost to folly. The horse acquired in this instance bore the name of Soofed-puri.

In Cashmere the troops were employed in petty operations against isolated chiefs. One of these, Sher Zeman Khan of Gundgurh, having risen in rebellion, Ram Dyal, the governor's son, and the grandson of the late Dewan Mohkum Chund, was employed against him, and unfortunately met his death in an action, which was a source of deep regret to Runjeet Singh, no less than to his father Motee Ram, and of general sympathy with all; for he was a rising officer of great promise in the Sikh army. The Raja of Rajaoree, Agur Khan, was in May made prisoner by Golab Singh, brother of Meean Dheean Singh, the deohrewala, or lord of privy chambers, of the Lahore court. For this service, the family obtained, in jagir, the principality of Jummoo, with which they had long been connected. In June, the troops employed in Cashmere, having suffered much from sickness, were relieved, and the governor, Motee Ram, who was of pacific devotional habits, was changed for a more martial chief, Huree Singh Nalooa, a Sikh jagirdar, who had killed a tiger single-handed on horseback, with the sacrifice, however, of his horse.

In this season, the court of Lahore received two visitors, one the ex-Raja of Nagpoor, Moodaji Bhoosla, commonly called Apa Saheb, who escaped as a fugitive, in disguise, after the campaign which ended in the capture of Aseergurh and reduced the last Mahratta opponent in arms of the British supremacy in India. He resided some time at Amritsur, while Runjeet was with his army to the south-west, but on his return, the fugitive was required to quit the capital and dominions of the Sikh, whereupon he retired to seek refuge in the hills with Raja Sunsar Chund. There, engaging in some intrigue with the Cabul princes at Lodiana, he was required by the Raja to leave his court, and he proceeded to Mundeë, where the chief, Eeshu-ree Sein, gave him temporary protection. The other visitor was the superintendent of the Company's studs in India, the adventurous British traveller, Mr. Moorcroft, who passed through Lahore on his route to Ladakh, as a merchant proceeding to purchase horses in Bokhara. He was received with much civility and attention by the Sikh, and from Ladakh, which he reached by way of Mundeë, made good his route across the northern mountains into Cashmere.

After October the muster of the Sikh army was taken at Seal-kot, whither Runjeet proceeded by the route of Batala. Thence, skirting the hills, and sending detachments against the turbulent Chib-

Bhao tribe, to ravage their possessions, he proceeded to Rawul Pindi, and dispossessing the chief, Nund Singh, annexed it to the Khalsa. He returned to Lahore on the 13th of December, and for the rest of the season was occupied chiefly in domestic arrangements.

Sher Singh, the eldest of the children brought forward by Suda Koonwur, had been adopted, and brought up by her with great expectations. He was now approaching man's estate, and began to be clamorous for a jagir and separate establishment. Runjeet encouraged him in this, hoping that the Rani would make a suitable provision from the possessions of the Ghunee Sirdaree, in her management. She, however, desired to force the recognition of Sher Singh, and the provision, on Runjeet, who obstinately refused, and craftily fomenting the dispute between Sher and his adoptive mother, gained over Bysakh Singh, an old and highly confidential retainer of the Ghunees, who was in great trust with Suda Koonwur. After this intrigue had been carrying on for some time, and Sher Singh's complaints had made an impression unfavourable to Suda Koonwur, Runjeet thought matters ripe for an authoritative act of interference on his part. He accordingly sent to his mother-in-law an order, in October, 1820, to set apart half of her own jagir for the maintenance of the two youths, Sher Singh and Tara Singh, whom she had brought up with such high expectations. She remonstrated in vain, and being herself in the Sikh camp, then at Shah-Dehra, and consequently in the power of Runjeet Singh, she felt the necessity of complying so far as to execute a deed, making the assignment required. But she had no sooner done so, than she plotted the means of escape, and after a time left the camp secretly in a covered carriage. Intelligence of her evasion was conveyed to Runjeet by Bysakh Singh. Desa Singh was accordingly sent with a detachment of horse to bring her back, and she was committed, by her son-in-law's order, to close confinement. Not content with this punishment, Runjeet ordered a division of his army to march and sequester all her wealth and territory, and this was effected, after a resistance of a few weeks, by one of her female attendants, who was in charge of the fort of Attul-gurh, her principal stronghold. Thus, after an influence maintained for nearly thirty years, fell at last this high-spirited woman. She had been serviceable to Runjeet Singh, indeed was the main stay of his power, in the early part of his career, and it was through her intrigues and aid that he was able to assume authority so early, and to put aside his mother and her dewan. The independence she asserted, and the high tone she was accustomed to assume, had for some time been irksome to the Sikh ruler in his growing fortunes, and her ruin was prepared by the course of events, no less than by her own unbending disposition. She bore the restraint of her confinement with great impatience, continually beating her breast in lamentation, and venting imprecations on the head of her ungrateful son-in-law.

Another domestic event, which preceded the catastrophe of Suda Koonwur's fall, was the birth of a son to Koonwur Khuruk Singh. The event took place in February, 1821, and was the occasion of great festivity and rejoicing; the child was called Nou-Nehal Singh. In April, Runjeet moved to Adenanugur, and remained there till July, occupied in collecting the hill tributes. The two petty territories of Kishtewar and Man-Kot were, in this interval, annexed to the Khalsa. The harshness of Huree Singh having made him unpopular and obnoxious to the inhabitants of Cashmere, he had been removed in December, 1820, and the mild and peaceable Motee Ram was re-appointed governor.

The above events having occupied the hot season and rains of 1821, the Sikh army was called out, as usual, after the Dussera, and Runjeet, taking the command in person, led it to the Indus, into the possessions of the chief of Munkera, Bukur, and Lea, south of Multan. Annual contributions and forced presents had for some time been extorted from Hafiz Ahmed, the nuwab: it was now determined to assume possession of the whole of his country. With this view, the army, marching by Ram-Nugur, Nur-Meanee, Pind-Dadur-Khan, and Bhera-Khooshab, reached the Indus at Meeta-Thana, and on the 5th November was encamped opposite to Dera-

Ismael-Khan. A detachment of 8,000 men was sent across, and the place was surrendered on the 9th by Manik Rae. Bukur, Lea, Khan-gurh, and Moujgurh, were then successively reduced without resistance. Munkera, fortified with a mud wall, and having a citadel of brick, but protected more by its position, in the midst of a desert, was now the only stronghold remaining. It was situated amongst sand-hills, in which it was difficult to supply a besieging army with water. A division was advanced for the investment of this place on the 18th, and beeldars were set to dig wells, the troops being supplied with water, in the first instance, at great expense, by land, from Moujgurh, on camels, ponies, or bullocks. By the 25th November, wells having been sunk, a further division was advanced to complete the investment of the place, and Runjeet moved there himself soon after, to superintend the conduct of the siege. Each jagirdar, as usual, was allowed to conduct his own approaches, and an active rivalry and spirit of competition was kept up amongst them by Runjeet. Between the 26th November and the 7th of December, the works were carried close to the ditch, but not without suffering from the continual fire of the besieged. The Nuwab Hafiz Ahmed, conceiving that enough now had been done for his honour, proposed terms, and stipulated for the surrender of Munkera, under condition of his being allowed to march out with his arms and personal property, and of receiving the town of Dera-Ismael-Khan, with a suitable jagir. Runjeet granted the terms, and desired to be put in possession of one of the gates of the fort. Solemn pledges were exchanged, and rich dresses sent to the nuwab, and every means taken to allay his suspicions. On the 14th December, 1821, he admitted a Sikh detachment, and surrendered the gates to it; and on the 18th, he came out with 300 followers, and encamped at a spot assigned to him within the Sikh position. On the 20th, he waited on Runjeet Singh, and was received with marked attention. An escort was sent with him to Dera-Ismael-Khan, and the treaty, as a new example of Sikh faith, was observed to the letter, and fully executed.

An engagement for tribute was now enforced on the Balooch Musulmans of Tonk and Sagur, west of the Indus, and the Sikh army then moved to Dera-Deen-Punah. Runjeet here embarked on the Indus, sending his army by land to Multan. At Dera Ghazi Khan, he arranged with the Nuwab of Bahawulpur for an increase of tribute, and of rent upon the farms he held of that place, and Mittun Kot. On the 10th January, 1822, he rejoined his army at Multan, but on the 16th posted on to Lahore, leaving it to follow. On arriving at his capital, on the 27th, he learned that one of his principal sirdars and jagirdars, Jy Singh Utarewala, had gone over to the Afghans west of the Indus.

It was in March 1822, that the first European adventurers presented themselves at Runjeet Singh's durbar, seeking military service. There arrived in that month two French officers, one M. Ventura, an Italian by birth, and the other M. Allard. Both had left Europe to seek their fortunes in the East upon the death-blow given at Waterloo to the hopes of the military youth of France. They had since been employed in Persia, but not liking the subordinate place they were there required to fill, they made their way, after a time, through Candahar and Cabul, to Lahore.* Runjeet was at first very suspicious of their motives, and could not at all understand what could have induced two young men to leave their native country, and travel so far. He could not believe that employment in his service was a sufficient object to have induced such a journey. They had stated their views verbally, and had besides given several representations in Persian, but these failed to satisfy the suspicious chief. He accordingly desired them to write down their views and wishes in their own language, and having thus obtained a paper in the French language, Runjeet sent it to his agent at Lodiana, to be there literally translated for him. On obtaining this satisfaction, Runjeet gave to the two French

* Major Lawrence states (Adv. in Punjab, vol. i. p. 42) that they are said to have suffered great distress on their travels, and even to have officiated in the great mosque of Peshawur or Cabul as criers to the morning prayers. M. Jacquemont (Letters from India, vol. i. p. 327) states that M. Allard was formerly aide-de-camp to Marshal Brune.

officers assurance of employ; and houses in Lahore, with handsome salaries, were at once assigned to them. M. Ventura was an infantry colonel in the French service; M. Allard had similar rank in the cavalry. They were both set to instruct troops in the European method of exercise and manœuvre. The native commandants were at first extremely jealous of the favour shewn to these Europeans, and of their exercising any authority or command; more especially because, on Runjeet's asking their opinion of the troops in their present condition, they had expressed themselves very slightly as to their state of discipline and drill. At first they were employed on the troops at the capital, which were under Runjeet's own eye and M. Allard received orders to raise a corps of dragoons, to be disciplined and drilled like the cavalry of Europe. These officers by their conduct won further confidence in the course of time, and others, particularly M. Court, who was brought up at the Polytechnic Institution at Paris, have followed, and joined them in subsequent years.

Towards the beginning of April, Runjeet

went to Aknur, in the Jummoo hills. His army was in the field, under Misur Dewan Chund, watching the movements of Uzeem Khan, who had come down to Peshawur; where, being joined by the fugitive jagirdar, Jy Singh Atarewala, he was pushing back the Sikh posts and garrisons towards the Indus, and even threatened Khyrabad, the principal station held by them on the western bank. In June, Runjeet returned to his capital, without achieving any enterprise of note.

Amongst the possessions of Suda Koonwur, was a small territory, called Himmutpur Wudni, lying south of the Sutluj, and held by her under grant from Runjeet, made in September, 1808, in consideration of a payment of 15,000 rupees. This territory, being on the protected side of the Sutluj, could not be confiscated with the rest. Runjeet, however, compelled his mother-in-law to execute in his favour a deed of relinquishment of right to the territory, and, armed with this, his agent proceeded to take forcible possession. Upon resistance, however, by Suda Koonwur's manager, and complaint to the British authorities, this deed was at first not admitted as valid, and the lands were ordered to be left in the former management. They continued thus to be preserved from the grasp of the Lahore ruler, until 1828, when, upon further representation, the supreme government consented to Runjeet Singh's assuming them under his management. Suda Koonwur's position was not in the least improved by this result; she continued to be held a close prisoner.

The rule of Runjeet in Cashmere was at this period oppressive. Mr. Moorcroft, writing from thence in 1822, says, "Runjeet Singh slackens not his impositions, but rack-rents the unfortunate Cashmerians to the last farthing he can extort. Rapacious as were the Duranis, they were irregular in their oppression, and many escaped through a careless scrutiny, mixed with something like feeling; but the raja is a systematic grinder, oppressing most mechanically. If Mahomed Uzeem Khan were immediately to make a vigorous attack from Peshawur, across the mountains, upon Cashmere, he would almost certainly succeed in driving out the Sikhs, from the aversion to the Singh existing not only in the Musulman but amongst the Hindu population."

CHAPTER XV.

IN October, after the Dussera of 1823, the Sikh army was assembled at Rotas, and muster taken of the jagirdars' contingents. Runjeet was on this occasion more than ordinarily severe in taking account of the numbers and equipment of the men, and amongst other chiefs who fell under his animadversion for neglect, was Dul Singh Miherna, an old jagirdar, who had served with much zeal and honour. He was threatened with a heavy mulct, and treated disparagingly; whereupon he took poison at night, and so relieved himself from further trouble. The army moved, in December, towards Rawul Pindi, whence Hukeem Useez-ud-deen was sent forward to Peshawar, to demand tribute from Yar Mahomed Khan, the governor. This chief, being unprepared for resistance, collected some valuable horses, and forwarded them as tribute, which satisfied Runjeet for the time; he returned to his capital in January, making the pilgrimage of Kitas on his route.

Mahomed Uzeem Khan disapproved of the compromise made by his brother of Peshawur, and marched from Cabul to superintend the affairs of this quarter in person. He arrived at Peshawur on the 27th January; and Yar Mahomed, fearing to meet him, sought a temporary refuge in the Yusufzai hills. Runjeet now ordered his army to cross the Indus, and the river was forded on the 13th March. Feroz Khan, chief of the Khutuks, being dead, a sequestration was made of all his possessions. On the 14th March, the army entered Akora, where it was joined by the fugitive, Jy Singh Atarewala, who was now anxious to make his terms, and be re-admitted to favour. His pardon was granted. Intelligence was soon after brought, that Mahomed Zeman Khan, nephew of Uzeem Khan, with Sudeeq Khan, son of the deceased Khutuk chief, Feroz Khan, were in position at Noushuhur, near the camp, with about 4,000 men, and had already cut off some parties of foragers. Runjeet ordered his army to be formed, directly he learned this intelligence, and marched forthwith to attack the Musulmans. The battle commenced with a furious charge, led by Phoola Singh Akali, a Sikh desperado,* who was in the habit of rushing forward, with some followers of like zeal, at the commencement of action. The Musulmans, however, also felt their battle to be a religious one, and met the fanatic Sikhs with corresponding zeal, so that the latter were completely destroyed, and their leader slain. Fresh troops were now ordered up by Runjeet, but the Mahomedans stood firm, and resisted every attack until sunset, by which time they had lost nearly half their originally small number, but still maintained their ground on two insulated hills. Runjeet now ordered his cavalry to surround the whole position of the enemy, and directed his Nujeeb and Goorkha battalions to charge and dislodge them. Twice did these troops advance to the charge, and twice were they repulsed by the determined body opposed to them ; nor could the utmost efforts of Runjeet's army dislodge them from their position before nightfall. In the course of the night, the remnant of the band cut their way through the surrounding posts of the Sikhs, and so made good their retreat to the mountains.

* When Mr. Moorcroft visited Amritsur, in May, 1820, this man expressed to him his contrition for his conduct towards Mr. Metcalfe (vol. i. p. 289), his dissatisfaction with Runjeet, his determination to attach himself to the English, and his readiness to carry fire and sword wherever Mr. Moorcroft should bid him. "I declined the interview which he solicited," says Mr. Moorcroft, "and recommended him to entertain more prudent and loyal purposes."—Travels, vol. i. p. 110.

There were not more of the Musulmans engaged on this occasion, than between four and five thousand men, and these were mere mountaineers and villagers, who turned out for the Ghazi, that is, to fight the religious battle against the infidel Sikhs. Disciplined professional soldiers there were none amongst them, yet did they resist, for a whole day, the entire army of Runjeet Singh, who had in the field against them not less than 24,000 men, and all his best troops. There were upwards of 1,000 men (Sir C. Wade says

2,000) killed and wounded on the side of the Sikhs, and amongst them four officers of distinction, Phoola Singh, Akali, Ghurba Singh and Kurum Singh, Chahul, two jagirdars, and Bulbhudur Singh, Goorkhali. The last named was the officer who had defended Nalapani, with so much determination, against Generals Gillespie and Martin-dell, at the commencement of the British war with Nepal. After peace was re-established, he formed an ill-fated connection with the wife of another, and, by the law of Nepal, his life became forfeit to the injured husband. This led to his expatriating himself, and taking employment from Runjeet Singh, where, after serving with distinction, he died in a manner worthy of his military reputation.

Mahomed Uzeem Khan was, during this action of the Ghazi, at Chumkawa, about four miles and a half east of Peshawur. He made no effort to succour or support the warriors, and was watched in his position by a Sikh force under Kripa Ram, Sher Singh, and Huree Singh, which had advanced by the opposite bank of the river. Upon learning that the party was overpowered, and had dispersed, he retired to Jelalabad, on the Cabul road, leaving the field clear to Runjeet and the Sikh army.

On the 17th March, Runjeet Singh made his entry into Peshawur, and advanced the army to Khybur Durra, where it was employed in pillaging and destroying the cultivation. It suffered much, however, from the activity and bigoted spirit, with which the Musulman population attacked its parties and cut off all stragglers; and the camp was kept during the night continually on the alert by their daring skirmishes. In April, Runjeet Singh secured the submission of Yar Mahomed Khan, who came with some fine horses, including the far-famed Kuhar, and with a request to be allowed to hold Peshawur as a tributary of Lahore. The Sikh was well content to make a settlement for the city and surrounding territory on this basis. He accordingly divided the country into five portions, or fiefs, between Nawab Summund Khan, Yar Mahomed Khan, Sooltan Mahomed Khan, Syud Mahomed Khan, and Pir Mahomed Khan, who contracted to send him annually a tribute of horses, rice, and fruits. Having effected this arrangement, he returned to his capital on the 26th April.

Mahomed Uzeem Khan died in the following month, and the event contributed to produce further confusion in the affairs of Afghanistan; for, while he lived, he was looked upon as the head of the family in succession to Futeh Khan, whereas, after his death, the numerous brothers and nephews of that chief acknowledged nobody, and their quarrels and contentions involved in disturbances the fairest portion of the Afghan territory. Mahmud and his son Kamran were confined to the fort and city of Herat, beyond which their name was nowhere respected, nor could they exercise any authority.

After the Dussera, in October, the Sikh army, being again called out, was led by Runjeet down the Indus, with the professed design of an attack upon Sinde. The river was crossed in November, and the whole of that month was occupied in reducing Bhutee villages, and exacting contributions from the Balooch and other jagirdars, whose possessions lay on the extreme northern frontier of the Sindian territory. The Lahore chief was, however, content with having thus felt his way this season, and in December moved his army homeward. At the close of the year, Raja Sunsar Chund, of Kangra, died, and was succeeded by his son Unrodh Chund. A nuzurana was demanded on the succession; and, upon the young raja demurring to the payment, Runjeet summoned him to attend in person at his summer residence of Adenanugur. He was persuaded by the Fakir Azeez-ud-deen to obey the summons, and met the court at Juwala Mookhee. On his arrival, an exchange of turbands took place, and mutual pledges were interchanged, between him and Khuruk Singh, on the part of the durbar; and, after much negotiation, a lakh of rupees was at last settled, and paid, as the nuzurana of accession, by Unrodh Singh.

Huree Singh Nulooa, who had been left with a force to overawe the turbulent Musulman population of the mountains about Gundgurh and Derbend, contrived, by harsh and vexatious proceedings, and particularly by the seizure of a Syud's daughter, to drive the whole into insurrection. The insurgents collected in such force, as to compel Huree Singh to stockade himself, and remain on the defensive, and he wrote to Runjeet Singh, representing the difficulties of his situation, and soliciting reinforcements. Runjeet ordered him to put on a bold face, and maintain himself as he could, but sent no immediate reinforcements, indeed, the rains having set in, it was not easy to do so. Huree Singh, in the mean time, being attacked, suffered a severe loss, and was compelled to retire before the insurgents. The Sikh army was, in consequence of this disaster, called out earlier than usual, and directed against the hills between the Indus and Cashmere, in the early part of October. By the 19th Runjeet had penetrated with a division of his troops to Gundgurrh, but found the population dispersed, and nothing but empty walls and deserted houses. The place, with all the surrounding villages, was burnt and pillaged; the unripe crops were used for forage to the army; and Runjeet, following the deserters, determined to ford the Indus after them, an attempt in which many lives were lost, but the object was effected on the 3rd November. When the army was well across, Mahomed Yar Khan was summoned to attend from Peshawur, which, after some hesitation, he did on the 16th November, bringing a present of horses, which was accepted, and the terms on which Peshawur had been assigned were renewed, with fresh protestations and oaths of allegiance on the part of the Afghan chief. On the 30th November, the Sikh army re-crossed the Indus, not without further loss, from the depth and bad footing at the ford. On the 10th December, Runjeet re-entered his capital, by no means satisfied with the result of the expedition, for he had incurred heavy expenses, and yet had been able to inflict no blow on the turbulent body of Mahomedans in insurrection, and had levied very little in the way of tribute and contribution.

No further expedition was attempted in 1824, or in the early part of the following year. Indeed, the Burmese war had been commenced by the British Government, and Runjeet seemed to watch with intense interest all the events and operations of it. The most exaggerated reports were spread at first of the successes of the Burmese, and there were not wanting counsellors to instil into the ear of the Lahore ruler, that the time was approaching when the field would be open to him to the east. It was at this period, that Mr. Moorcroft forwarded to Calcutta a letter of Prince Neselrode, the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, addressed to Runjeet Singh, purporting to introduce an agent, named Agha Mehdee. The agent, it seems, was endeavouring to make his way by the difficult route of Tibet, and either died, or was murdered, some few stages from Ladakh. There Mr. Moorcroft obtained his papers, and amongst them this letter, which he procured to be translated afterwards by M. Ksoma de Körös, with whom he fell in on his travels. The letter, except as introductory of the agent, was merely one of compliment, with assurances of protection to any merchants of the Punjab who might penetrate to the Russian dominions.

No military enterprise was undertaken in the season 1824-1825; but, in April, 1825, sequestration was made of all the jagirs and possessions formerly assigned to Dewan Mohkum Chund, and now managed for Motee Chund by Kripa Ram, the dewan's grandson. The bad management of the jagirs, and the inefficient contingent kept up by this agent, were the assigned reasons, Motee Ram himself being left in his government of Cashmere, and subjected to no indignity or diminution of favour, consequent upon the sequestration. In the Dussera of 1825, the army was called into the field, with the avowed purpose of an expedition against Sinde. With this view, Runjeet marched the troops to Pind-Dadur-Khan; but learning there, that the Sinde country was suffering from scarcity and famine, he gave up the design, and returned to Lahore on the 24th November. An agent he had sent into Sinde, to demand tribute, returned with vakeels from the ruling Meers, and they for some time continued to reside at Lahore. It was at this period that Runjeet's close associate and turband brother, Futeh Singh Aloowala, conceived some suspicions as to the safety of his position at the durbar, and suddenly left Lahore, to place himself in security within the possessions held by him on the protected side of the Sutluj. Runjeet was much vexed at this sudden step of his old ally, and made great efforts to induce him to return. The British officers, while they confirmed him in the assurance of the inviolability of his territory on the protected side of the Sutluj, advised him not to yield to vague suspicions, as a ground for breaking a friendship of so long standing as had subsisted between himself and Runjeet. Guided by this advice, Futeh Singh, some time after, that is, in April, 1827, yielded to the invitations of the Lahore ruler, and, returning to his durbar, was well received, the Maharaja sending his grandson, Nou Nehal, to give him the meeting of honour. He soon, however, became an object of rapacity, being called upon to pay tribute, or take in farm, at no easy rent, much of the territory he had hitherto enjoyed free, by the assignment of his turband brother.

Sadiq Mahomed Khan, the Nuwab of Bahawulpur, died in April, 1826, and was succeeded by Bahawul Khan, who renewed his father's leases and engagements with Runjeet, for the territory he held west and north of the Sutluj. In September, a question arose upon the application of Kootub-uddeen of Kasoor to be received under British protection, as holder of Mundot and Rumna-wala on the left bank of the Sutluj; but the feudatory relations this chief had come under to Runjeet Singh for these, as for his other possessions, forbade the British Government from holding out the hope that he could be received under protection as an independent chief. An unsuccessful attempt by Beer Singh, ex-Raja of Noorpur, in the Hills, to recover the territory from which he had been ejected since 1816, is the only other event recorded in this year. He was defeated and made prisoner by Desa Singh. A main cause of the inactivity of the Sikhs arose from the increasing infirmities of Runjeet. His indispositions and ailings increased upon him so much, towards the end of the year, that he applied to the British Government for a medical officer, and Dr. Andrew Murray was sent over from Lodia to attend his highness.

In the early part of 1827, the reformer, Syud Ahmed, raised the green standard of Mahomed in the mountains inhabited by the Yusufzais, and commenced a religious war against the Sikhs. This individual was originally a petty officer of horse in the service of Ameer Khan. Upon the breaking up of the military establishment of that chief, in 1818-19, Syud Ahmed took a fanatical turn; and fancying he had received special revelations, went to Delhi, and associated himself with some muluvis of sanctity in that city. One of them collected these revelations into a book; and from it the Syud, and his associates and followers, commenced preaching against many irregularities that had crept into the practice of the Mahomedan religion. Amongst the principal were, the reverence paid by the Moslems of Hindustan to the tombs of saints and relations, the manner of their celebrating the death of Husun and Hoosein, the sons of Ali, and other similar customs, which these reformers denounced as idolatrous, and as deviations from the pure precepts of the Koran. In 1822, Syud Ahmed came down to Calcutta, and was there much followed by the Musulman population. Thence he took ship to make the pilgrimage of Mecca. On his return, he travelled through Hindustan, and declared his intention of devoting himself to the service of his religion, by waging an interminable holy war against the Sikh infidels. Many zealots and fanatics joined him, and subscriptions of money were poured in upon him from all parts of the British possessions. Thus armed and prepared, he made his way to the hills near Peshawur, and raised the Mohumdee Jhenda, as above stated, amongst the Yusufzai Musulmans. Runjeet was compelled, by the formidable character of the insurrection thus organized, to send a strong force across the Attock, for the protection of Khyrabad and his interests in that quarter. In March, 1827, the Syud, at the head of a countless irregular host, ventured to attack this force, which was commanded by Budh Singh Sinduwalea, an old warrior, and had thrown up works to strengthen itself in its position. The assailants surrounded the works, and the Sikhs were in great distress for some days. At length Budh Singh, losing patience, proposed to the sirdars to attack the enemy, and invoking his guru, headed the assault. The Sikh discipline and superior equipment secured them an easy victory (each Sikh killing fifteen to twenty of the runaways), and the Syud, being entirely defeated, retired with his followers into the hills, whence he kept up a desultory and annoying warfare with the Sikhs, directed against their convoys and small detachments.

Lord Amherst passed the hot season of the year 1827 at the station of Simla, near Subathoo, in the hills east of the Sutluj. The proximity of this position to Lahore induced Runjeet Singh to send a mission of compliment to his lordship, with presents, and amongst others, a handsome tent of shawl for the king of England. The mission was received with distinction, and a return compliment made of the same kind. Captain Wade, the officer at Lodiana, through whom the correspondence with the Lahore ruler was conducted, and some officers of the Governor-General's personal suite, were deputed to Lahore, with return presents, and a suitable retinue, to express the Governor-General's satisfaction at the terms of cordiality and friendship which subsisted between the two states. In 1828, the British Commander-in-Chief, Lord Combermere, passed the warm season at Simla, and a complimentary vakeel was sent over by Runjeet Singh to offer his congratulations. It was his lordship's desire to procure an invitation in person to Lahore, but the wily chief evaded compliance with this wish.

At the durbar of Lahore, at this time, the entire favour of the chief was engrossed by Raja Dhean Singh, the chamberlain, and his brothers Golab Singh and Soochet Singh, Meeans of Jummoo, where their influence had been re-established under Runjeet Singh's authority, by the grant of the place in jagir in 1819, as before related. Heera Singh, a boy of about twelve years of age, son of Raja Dhean Singh, was the object of particular favour, Runjeet Singh seldom suffering him out of his sight, and seeming to delight in humouring all his whims and caprices. In common with his father and uncles, he was created Raja, and Runjeet studied to procure him a high matrimonial alliance. It was about this time that Raja Unrodh Chund, son of Sunsar Chund, of Kangra, paid a visit to Lahore, with his family, on his route to attend the nuptial ceremonies of the Aloo-wala's son, Nehal Singh. He had with him two sisters, on whom Rajah Dhean Singh cast his eyes, desiring them to be joined in matrimony with his family. The pride of the hill chief was roused at the proposition of so degrading an alliance, but the influence of Runjeet procured from him a written promise, that the two young women should be at his disposal. The mother of Unrodh Chund, however, succeeded in carrying them off, and took refuge with them in the hills under British protection, whither Unrodh Chund himself soon followed, leaving his possessions on the other side of the Sutluj at the mercy of Runjeet Singh, who sequestered the whole, and received the surrender of them without any resistance from Futeh Chund, Unrodh's brother. A khawas, or concubine, of Raja Sunsar Chund, named Guddun, was enticed away from the family, and fell on this occasion into Runjeet's hands, with several children she had borne to the late raja. Two of the daughters the Sikh married himself, and upon a son he conferred the title of Raja, with a considerable jagir. The nuptials of Heera Singh were at the same time celebrated with great pomp, though not with a member of the Kangra family.

In the course of 1829, Syud Ahmed again appeared in the field in great strength, and his vengeance was directed against Yar Mahomed Khan, who, he declared, had sacrificed the cause of his religion by swearing allegiance to, and accepting service from, the Sikhs. As the Syud approached Peshawur, Yar Mahomed moved out with such troops as he could collect for its defence. In the action which followed, however, he received a mortal wound, and his troops dispersed. Peshawur was saved to Runjeet Singh by the opportune presence there of M. Ventura, who had gone with a small escort to negotiate with Yar Mahomed Khan for the surrender of a famous horse, called Lylee. The horse had been demanded in the previous year, but the Afghans declared it was dead,

The falsity of this declaration being discovered, a written engagement had been extorted from Yar Mahomed, pledging himself for its delivery, and M. Ventura was deputed to enforce the execution of this deed. Upon the death of Yar Mahomed, he took upon himself to make dispositions for the defence of Peshawur, and wrote to Runjeet for instructions as to his further proceedings. The Sikh directed the city to be delivered over to Sooltan Mahomed Khan, brother of the deceased Yar Mahomed, but urged the securing possession of the famous horse Lylee, as an indispensable preliminary. M. Ventura succeeded fully in this negotiation, and brought away Lylee, leaving Sooltan Mahomed in possession of the government of Peshawur.

M. Ventura had not been long gone, when Syud Ahmed appeared again, with his host of Yusufzais before Peshawur, and Sooltan Mahomed, venturing an action, was defeated, so that Peshawur fell under the temporary power of the fanatic chief. Runjeet took the field with his army, in the early part of 1830, to punish this pretender.

On his crossing the Attock, however, and approaching Peshawur, the insurgent force dissolved before him, and he returned to Lahore, leaving a strong detachment across the Indus, to act as occasion might offer, having restored Sooltan Mahomed to his government. This chief, after the departure of Runjeet Singh, found it convenient to come to terms with Syud Ahmed, who again came down, and by a sudden attack carried Peshawur. The governor consented to allow free passage to men and money proceeding to join the reformer ; to place the administration of justice in Peshawur in the hands of a Kazeer, and officers of the reformed faith and principles, and to pay monthly to the Syud 3,000 rupees. The city was on these conditions restored to Sooltan Mahomed, but the Syud had no sooner retired, than the Kazeer and two Moolvees, left to administer justice according to his reformed principles, were slain in a popular tumult. Syud Ahmed's difficulties increased, for the Yusufzais took offence at some innovations he desired to introduce into the marriage ceremony, and were alarmed by his announcing the doctrine, that a tenth of all income or revenue should be subscribed for religious and state purposes. The wild untutored mountaineers rose against the preacher's authority, and not only rejected these doctrines, but compelled the Syud and his immediate followers to leave their mountains. He fled across the Indus, and found a temporary refuge in the mountains of Pekhli and Dhumtour. Runjeet Singh, however, sent a detachment against him, under Sher Singh, and in the early part of 1831, the detachment was fortunate enough to fall in with him, when, after a short but smart engagement, the Syud's force was dispersed and himself slain. His head was cut off, and sent in to be recognized and identified. His followers in Hindustan have, however, difficulty in believing yet, that he is dead, and still hope to see him display himself in some great action, for the permanent benefit of the faith, and for the extension of the dominion and power of its professors.

CHAPTER XVI.

WHEN Lord Amherst returned to Europe in 1828, he carried with him the shawl tent presented by Runjeet Singh to the king of England, and it was determined to send from England a return present, and a very extraordinary selection was made; upon whose advice, has not transpired. It was resolved to send to Runjeet, on the part of his Majesty, a team of cart-horses, four mares and one stallion, upon some notion that, in his love for horses, Runjeet must be a breeder of the animal, and would be well pleased to have mares of large size to cross with the breeds of the Punjab. The fact, however, is, that Runjeet had no breeding stud nor establishment, and cared only for entire horses of high courage, well broken in to the manège of Hindustan, that he could ride himself, on parade or on the road, or set his choice sirdars and favourites upon. The result shewed this; for when the cart-horses arrived at his court, the stallion was immediately put into the breaker's hands, and taught the artificial paces usual. This animal, with its enormous head and coarse legs, stood always in the palace-yard, or before the tent of the chief, decorated with a golden saddle and necklaces of precious stones, and was sometimes honoured by being crossed by Runjeet Singh himself. The mares were never looked at, and were matters of absolute indifference to the Sikh. It is, however, an anticipation to state what happened on the arrival of the animals, their adventures on the road to Lahore involved matters of higher interest.

It was resolved to make the transmission of this present a means of obtaining information in regard to the Indus, and the facilities, or the contrary, it might offer to navigation. The recent successes of Russia in Persia, and the probability of that power entertaining further designs, either present, or hereafter, when the succession of Abbas

Meerza to the throne of Persia* might render that kingdom a province of Russia, made it desirable that intelligence should be collected, as to the frontier states of India, and the means of defence offered by this great river barrier in particular. The dray-horses were accordingly sent out to Bombay, and the supreme government instructed Sir John Malcolm, the governor of that presidency, to take measures to have them forwarded under charge of an intelligent and prudent officer, in boats up the Indus. Some demur was anticipated on the part of the rulers of Sindh to allowing them a passage through the Delta and lower part of the river; but it was assumed that the governing Meers, situated as they were relatively to Runjeet Singh on one hand, and the British Government on the other, would not readily incur the risk of offending both powers, by refusing a passage, if it were insisted upon.

Sir John Malcolm, having received the horses, forwarded them to Cutch, and appointed to the mission to Lahore, in charge of them, Lieutenant (afterwards Sir Alexander) Burnes, then assistant to Colonel (now Sir Henry) Pottinger, who was in political charge of that district and of the British relations with Sinde. The young officer thus selected had been in the Quarter-Master General's department, and was in every respect qualified for the duty. Sir John Malcolm added to the dray-horses the present of a carriage of his own, as useless an article to Runjeet as the mares. The highly ornamental carriage sent to him by Lord Minto, in 1810, after being used for a few days as a novel plaything, had ever since remained neglected in the great arsenal at Lahore. The carriage and horses, however, were despatched from Cutch towards the end of the year 1830, and Sir John Malcolm thought the most politic course would be, to send them without previous notice or correspondence with the Meers of Sinde, thinking the necessity they would thus be under of deciding suddenly would be likely to contribute to the success of the expedition.

Lieutenant Burnes accordingly started, carrying with him the letters announcing the purpose of his coming, and entered with his fleet one of the mouths of the Indus. Passing up to the first inhabited town, he forwarded his despatches to Hyderabad. After a detention of some days, he was, on the 1st February, met by an officer and guard from Darajee, who requested him to wait at the mouth of the river till orders should arrive from Hyderabad. With this he complied, but there experienced so much incivility from the Kurachee people, who relieved the guard from Darajee, that he resolved to return and wait in Cutch till the Meers should decide upon his coming. The consent of the Meers was not, however, obtained till after a negotiation of nearly six weeks; at length Lieutenant Burnes sailed again on the 10th March, and on this occasion entered the Ruchel mouth by Kurachee Bundur, the extreme western channel of the river. Here difficulties were made, and delays interposed, so as to induce Lieutenant Burnes to start by land for Hyderabad, in the hope of removing them by personal negotiation. He had proceeded no further than Tatta, when, after much chicanery he received the required permission to pass by the route of the Indus. Boats of the country were now furnished to him, and every possible assistance rendered for his conveyance to Hyderabad, no effort being spared to obliterate the effects of the previous unfriendly treatment he had experienced. At the capital he was received in Durbar with great distinction, a chief of rank was appointed to attend him on his journey, and the best accommodation-boats on the river, even those of the ruling Meer himself, were assigned for his conveyance. Everywhere in Sinde he met with the same attention, and proceeded on his voyage by Tatta to Hyderabad, and thence after a short stay to Bukur. The mission reached Tatta on the 15th, and Hyderabad on the 18th April, 1831, and the month of May had closed before it left the Indus, and entered the Chenab. The river was then at its lowest, but nowhere was there the slightest difficulty or obstruction to the navigation.

Sinde was then divided into three independent governments: the first, and by far the most considerable, was Hyderabad, ruled at this time by Meer Moorad Ali, last survivor of the four brothers, who, in 1780, effected the revolution which transferred the dominion of the country to the Talpoor family. The second division was that of Khyrpoor, to the north of the first, and lying on both sides of the river Indus. Its ruler was Meer Roostum Khan, the eldest son of Meer Soohrab Khan. The third division was that of Meerpoor, lying towards Cutch, and ruled by Meer Ali Moorad Khan. These subdivisions of the country had their origin in a partition made amongst the principal conspirators, by whose exertions the Talpoors obtained power.

Having passed through the Hyderabad territory, Lieutenant Burnes was received with even increased attention and kindness by the ruler of Khyrpoor, who professed a strong desire to cultivate a more intimate relation with the British Government, and made Lieutenant Burnes the bearer of a communication to this effect to the Governor-General. By this chief the mission was carried forward to the territory of the Nuwab of Bahawalpur, without experiencing the smallest obstruction or difficulty of any kind: there was found nowhere less than eight feet of water, and the current was moderate, and easily overcome, even where, from rocks, or hard soil at the banks, the water-way was contracted. The month of May was now passing, during which the navigation of the Ganges is much obstructed by strong westerly winds, and by the want of water, but no difficulty of the kind impeded the passage up the Indus at this season. The Bahawulpur chief was already in political relation, both with Runjeet Singh and with the British Government; from him, therefore, Lieutenant Burnes was sure of receiving every kindness. On the 30th May, the fleet reached Mittunkot, and embarking on other boats provided by the chief of the Daoodputras (Bahawul Khan), entered the Punjnud, being the united stream of the waters of the Punjab. A little below Multan, the escort and party sent by Runjeet to receive and conduct the royal* present, met

* It is a singular circumstance, that Sir J. Malcolm, in all the instructions he gave Lieutenant-Colonel Pottinger and Lieutenant Burnes, in regard to this mission,

Lieutenant Burnes with boats of the Punjab, adapted to the navigation of the winding Ravi. In these Lieutenant Burnes and his party embarked on the 12th June, and soon reached Multan. The mouth of the Ravi is further up the Sutluj, and he did not enter that branch till the 23rd June. The rainy season overtook the mission while in that river, and the progress up it was tedious, being dependent entirely on the track-rope.

On the 17th of July, Lieutenant Burnes reached Lahore, where his arrival with the present from the King of England, and with the letter of Lord Ellenborough which accompanied it, was a source of great pride and rejoicing to Runjeet Singh. The attention he paid to Lieutenant Burnes was very never mentioned, nor gave the smallest intimation to either officer, that the dray-horses were a present from the King of England. They made the discovery after the difficulties in respect to the passage through Sindh had been overcome, when a direct correspondence with the mission was opened by the Governor-General. Up to this time, they had believed, and had represented, the present to be sent from the British Government in India.

marked, and he had invited Captain Wade over from Lodiana, to assist at the ceremonial of reception. From Lahore, Lieutenant Burnes proceeded to Simla, to render to the Governor-General an account of his mission, and to lay before his lordship the valuable information obtained during it. This enterprising and zealous officer obtained his lordship's permission to return to his presidency of Bombay through Persia, and to explore the route of Balkh and Bokhara, after first crossing the Punjab and Cabul territory, in order that he might be the means of adding information of this little-known route to the stores of intelligence already contributed by him.

The very favourable disposition in which the ruler of Lahore seemed to be at this juncture encouraged Lord William Bentinck to hope, that a proposition for a personal meeting between himself and Runjeet Singh would be well received. He accordingly instructed Captain Wade, when at Lahore, to sound the chief's confidential advisers on the subject. As anticipated by his lordship, Runjeet shewed great desire for the meeting, but some difficulty was at first started in respect to the etiquette of a previous return mission, Runjeet Singh having paid his lordship the compliment of sending one, similarly composed to that which waited on Lord Amherst. The mission had been received by Lord William Bentinck in April, soon after his arrival at Simla; its members were the Dewan Mootee Ram, son of Mohkum Chund, Huree Singh, sirdar, and the secretary, Fakir Uzeez-ud-deen. They had been treated by the Governor-General with much distinction, and a return mission of some of the principal officers of his lordship's suite had been promised, or rather held out in expectation. The personal meeting between the heads of the two states would necessarily deprive Runjeet Singh of this compliment; for, in the first place, the time would scarcely allow of both, seeing that the intended journey of the Governor-General to Ajmer and Rajpootana required, that, if arranged at all, the interview should take place before the end of October, and in the second, if a formal mission were sent, immediately before the meeting, it would have the appearance, in the eyes of the world, of being sent to supplicate or induce the ruler of the Sikhs to come to the interview, whereas the rank and position of the head of the British Government required that the honour of a personal conference with him should be sought.

With a liberality, not inconsistent with his general character, Runjeet Singh, having made up his mind to the interview, gave up the point of etiquette, and preparation was made on both sides for the meeting to take place on the Sutluj about the 20th of October, without any previous return mission; the neighbourhood of Roopur was subsequently fixed upon as the most appropriate and convenient spot for the meeting.

In order to give éclat to the occasion, and to form a suitable escort, the Governor-General ordered up to Roopur, from Meerut and Kurnal, two squadrons of European lancers, with the mounted band of the regiment (H. M. 16th Lancers), an European regiment (H. M. 31st foot), two battalions of native infantry (the 14th and 32nd), and eight guns of horse artillery, with two squadrons of Colonel Skinner's irregular horse. The escort was thus composed, in order to exhibit to Runjeet Singh, whose curiosity was much excited as to the formation and equipment of the various arms and corps of our military force, as much variety as possible. In marching the Europeans through the Sikh territory, the population was somewhat scandalized at ascertaining that beef was killed in camp for their rations. The slaughter was made in the night, as secretly as possible; still the fact transpired, and became matter of complaint from the Sikh sirdars. The reply to them was, that it was no business of theirs to inquire what was done within the precincts of a British camp; that our customs prevailed there, and these could not be yielded to their scruples, though every care should be taken to prevent the obtrusion of any thing that was offensive. There is no doubt that the prejudices of the Sikhs were much outraged by the slaughter of oxen, but it would have been extremely bad policy to yield the point in this instance; for were it conceded, and the necessity to arise hereafter (as it has arisen), of bringing a considerable force of Europeans into the country, a similar concession would be expected when it would be impossible to grant it, and the population would be excited, from the want of previous knowledge and preparation, and the recollection that heretofore the concession had been made to their religious feelings.

The troops having arrived at Roopur, the Governor-General, who had left Simla on the 19th October, entered the camp on the evening of the 22nd. Runjeet Singh came into his camp, on the opposite side of the Sutluj, on the morning of the 25th, escorted by 10,000 of his best horse, and about 6,000 trained infantry. He was immediately waited upon by a deputation from the Governor-General, headed by Major-General Ramsay, brother to the Commander-in-Chief, Lord Dalhousie, and by his lordship's principal secretary. Koonwur Khuruk Singh, with six principal sirdars of the Sikhs, came at the same time to present the Maharaja's compliments to the Governor-General. It was arranged that Runjeet Singh should visit the Governor-General next day in the morning.

As the time approached for the meeting, Runjeet began to entertain an apprehension that some treachery or foul play must be designed: late overnight, he sent M. Allard to say that he should not attend the meeting of the morrow. M. Allard waited upon him immediately, and exerted himself to remove these suspicions and restore confidence, offering to stake his own head that nothing would happen that was disagreeable. He left the Maharaja still irresolute, and the astrologers were summoned. They consulted the Grant'h and declared the result favourable, but told his Highness to take with him a couple of apples, and to present them to the Governor-General and to his secretary: if they were at once taken without demur, he was to consider it as a good omen, and might proceed in full assurance that the result of the meeting would give him satisfaction. On the morning of the 26th October, a deputation went to conduct the Maharaja to camp, and he started at sunrise. A bridge of the flat-bottomed ferry-boats of the Sutluj had been constructed for the convenience of communication. Runjeet Singh made to cross over before him 3,000 of his best Ghorchur cavalry, dressed in new yellow silk quilted coats, also about 800 of M. Al-lard's dragoons ; he then took his breakfast of a highly spiced cordial, and sent over the chiefs he meant should attend on their elephants. This occupied some time, for the boats were fragile and would allow but few elephants to be put on the bridge together. Lastly, his Highness passed over in person, and then, to prevent all confusion, ordered the guard at the bridge to permit none else from his camp to cross over. With the escort and attendance thus formed, the Sikh chief crossed the open plain, at the further end of which lay the camp of the Governor-General, from the centre of which a street was formed of the British troops collected. On reaching the end of the line, the Maharaja stopped to examine each corps, and put an infinity of questions as to their equipment, asking the use and cost of every strange article that caught his eye. In the middle of the street

he was met by the Governor-General, and presented the apples as enjoined by the astrologers: they were freely and at once taken. His Highness then crossed into the Governor-General's houda, and the two chiefs proceeded together to the tents of audience that had been prepared. In an outer tent, all the European gentlemen were collected, and Runjeet Singh was detained in it a short time, that several of them might be presented to him, standing, as he passed through. In a further tent chairs were laid out, and the Maharaja, with the chiefs of his nomination, and some select officers of the suite, was led thither by the Governor-General for a more private conference. It was amusing to see the pains taken by Runjeet in the arrangement of his part of the ceremony. He waited at the door of the outer tent, and himself called and told off the chiefs that were to proceed to the inner, making them precede himself in order to prevent confusion or crowding. They were all, like himself, dressed in yellow, that and light green being the favourite colours of his court, and called Busunttee, or the colours of spring. Some wore elegant, highly-polished armour, with scarfs of this colour, and the splendour of the attire of all was very striking. The inquisitive and apparently frank manner of the Sikh chief made the conference pass off with more liveliness than is usual on such occasions of ceremony. Presents of every variety of manufactured stuffs, which had previously been sent for, from Calcutta, Dacca, and Benares, with guns and jewels of value, a fine Burmese elephant, and two select thorough-bred young horses from the Hissar stud, were laid out or passed in review before his Highness. Dresses of honour and presents were also laid out for the heir-apparent, and other chiefs, according to a list obtained from his Highness. The Maharaja examined carefully every article of his own present, and then sent for the keeper of his wardrobe, and desired him to receive charge and pack up the articles forthwith. He took his leave, apparently highly pleased with the interview, and at the door of the tent, called up and paraded before the Governor-General, his own favourite horses, telling the names and merits of each. Again, as he passed through the street of troops, he stopped to examine the different corps, and his inquiries into every minute particular were renewed. It was noon before he reached his own camp in returning.

On the following day, the Governor-General returned the visit, and was met at the bridge of boats by Runjeet Singh. His lordship was escorted by the lancers, who, with their mounted band, preceded the cavalcade. Runjeet was much struck with their appearance, particularly with that of the band; and, after they had crossed and drawn up on the farther side of the river, he went up to them and listened for some time to their playing, while the suite crossed. The Sikh troops formed line, from the bridge to the Maharaja's tents, which, consisting chiefly of kunats and sumeeanas, tastefully arranged, were of red colour, and covered a large space. The lining of all the sumeeanas, under which the chairs were placed for the Governor-General and his suite, was of shawl, beautifully worked, and that under which sat the Governor-General and his Highness himself, was a sheet of inlaid pearls and jewels of great value. The Maharaja, after the party were seated, introduced his chiefs in succession, and each, as he came forward, presented nuzurs of Dutch gold sequins, both to his Highness and to the Governor-General. The horses were again brought forth, and exhibited in superb trappings, and after an hour passed in lively conversation, the presents for the Governor-General were laid out, and his lordship took his leave.

Evening entertainments were afterwards exchanged, and reviews held of the troops collected on both sides. The Maharaja seemed particularly struck with some of the evolutions exhibited before him by the British regiments, and sent his sirdars up to the ranks to examine particularly how they were executed. He himself also went up to the squares formed by the infantry, to see how many ranks knelt, and how many kept up fire, shewing in all things a most insatiable curiosity.

On the 31st October, the last day of the interview, the Maharaja came across the river to witness some artillery practice with grape and spherical-case shot. His astonishment at the effect on the curtain at different distances, from four hundred to one thousand paces, was extreme. After amusing himself afterwards with firing at a chutur, or umbrella, with one of the six-pounders, and exhibiting feats of horsemanship and dexterity, by his sirdars, he was presented by the Governor-General with two nine-pounder horse artillery guns, with horses and equipments complete.

The evening of this day was that of the parting interview, which it was arranged was to take place at the entertainment given by the Governor-General. At Runjeet's particular request, a paper was executed and delivered to him on this occasion, promising perpetual friendship from the British Government. A complete model of an iron suspension bridge, made up at Calcutta for the purpose, was also presented to his Highness, and excited his applause and admiration. On the following morning, the 1st November, 1831, both camps broke ground, and commenced their march in opposite directions, after a week of magnificence and mutual display, reminding one of the days of "The Field of Cloth of Gold."

No business of importance was transacted at this interview; Runjeet Singh, however, invited the two officers he thought most in the Governor-General's confidence to his tent, and in the midst of much desultory conversation, put to the official secretary, who was one of them, several questions in respect to Sind, as if desirous to open a negotiation, and concert measures, in relation to that state; or at least to come to an understanding, as to the views of the British Government in respect to it. He said the vukeels of Sind were in attendance in his camp, and he asked if he might introduce them to the Governor-General. Upon being answered in the affirmative, he added, that it was a very rich country, and much treasure had been accumulated there, ever since Nadir Shah's invasion of Hindustan; that there was no standing army, or any soldiers, except the population at large, who would be called from the plough to take the field against an invading force. He then made allusion to the Meers having sent back Lieutenant Burnes, and to their general character for pride and haughtiness. It appeared evident that the Maharaja had learned, or at least suspected, that the British Government had some further views in respect to Sindé ; also, that nothing would be more gratifying to him than to be invited to co-operate in an attack upon that state. Notwithstanding, however, the desire thus shewn to come to an understanding on the subject, it was not thought advisable to make any communication yet to the ruler of Lahore, for it was conceived, that, if made aware of the intentions of the British Government, he might, with every profession of a desire to forward them, contrive by intrigue and secret working to counteract the negotiation.

On the very day before his Highness arrived at Roopur, instructions had been issued to Lieutenant-Colonel Pottinger, to prepare for a mission to Sindé, with a view to the negotiation of a commercial treaty, having for its object to open the navigation of the Indus to the trade of Europe, and of India.

The negotiation was to be separate with each of the three independent Meers ; but Colonel Pottinger was directed to proceed first to Hyderabad, to arrange with Meer Moorad Ali for a free passage for vessels and merchandize through the mouths and delta of this great river. The basis of the negotiation was to be, to obtain guarantees against the levy of irregular duties, or wanton obstruction of any kind to boats and merchandize ; to offer a guarantee against loss of revenue to the Sind Government from the adoption of the scheme, and so to procure that the river Indus should become again the channel for extensive commerce, and be frequented securely by the craft and vessels of all the adjoining districts, and even of Europe. The object of entering upon this negotiation, at the particular juncture, was perhaps in some measure political, having reference to the necessity of being prepared against the possibility of designs on the part of Russia, should she succeed in establishing her influence in Persia. The Governor-General, however, was not prepared to make any avowal or display of such motives, and a commercial treaty, stipulating for the free navigation of the river, seemed to him the better form in which to open relations with the governments and chiefs who occupied its banks.

The result of this mission was, that, in April, 1832, treaties were made between the British Government and the Meers, stipulating that a free passage should be afforded to the merchants and traders of Hindustan, by the river and roads of Sind, upon payment of moderate duties.*

CHAPTER XVII.

A.D. 1832 TO 1837.

FROM this period Runjeet appears not only to have dismissed from his mind all distrust of the British Government, but to have cherished sentiments of the most cordial friendship towards it, evinced by the manner in which he received English visitors at his court, and especially by the frank and unsuspecting tone of his communications in all political discussions. In the negotiations for opening the navigation of the rivers,—a measure which the British Government had much at heart, but to which an eastern potentate, in the position of Runjeet, might naturally have had some repugnance,—he entered into all our views; and at a later period (January, 1835), a treaty was concluded between the two governments, by which moderate tolls were established upon the Indus and Sutluj, in conformity with the treaty of 1832.

The notoriety of his friendly relations with the only other independent state in Hindustan contributed, no doubt, to strengthen his power and influence, with which henceforward no formidable enemy ventured to contend, and even his tributaries, however restless under his supremacy and exhausted by his oppressions, were discouraged from rebellion, the only resource in the East against the abuse of power, and which even oriental despots cannot prevent. In July, 1832, an attempt at insurrection was made in the hills, headed by Payindah Khan, of Derbend, aided by some neighbouring zemindars; but it was promptly put down by Huree Singh, though not without loss on both sides.

Runjeet this year exhibited another proof of that contempt of public decency which has been already mentioned as a trait in his character, by formally marrying and raising to the gudi a dancing-girl, named Gulbahar, celebrating their nuptials with great pomp, and conferring high titles upon her relatives,

In the early part of 1833, the deposed and expatriated King of Cabul, Shah Shuja-ul-Moolk, made another attempt to recover his throne ; and with this view, understanding that he had no hope of direct aid from the British Government, he entered into a treaty with Runjeet Singh. In September, 1831, the Shah had opened negotiations with the Maharaja, proposing, through his agent at Lahore, as the price of the Sikh's assistance, the cession, to Runjeet and his successors, of Cashmere, Peshawur, and other possessions of Cabul, which the Sikhs had acquired by arms or stratagem. Runjeet appears to have entered with alacrity into the scheme, with the design of extorting as much as possible from the necessities of the unfortunate prince, and his counter-project affords proof of his encroaching and rapacious disposition. He required that the Shah should meet him at Amritsur or Lahore, where he would have been a prisoner as long as it suited Runjeet's policy to detain him ; that the Shah's heir-apparent should attend the Sikh court, and always accompany the Maharaja wherever he went, whereby he would have been a hostage for his father's conduct ; that the Shah should disclaim for himself and his successors all right and title to the places acquired not only by the Maharaja, but by his dependants and tributaries, which opened a large avenue to future usurpations ; that the Shah should pay down at once three lakhs of rupees (30,000*l.*), and send 102 horses of the finest description annually to Lahore—"the Maharaja's passion for horses being well known"—besides other valuable presents ; that whenever the Maharaja was in want of troops, the Shah should send his army to him, with one of his sons ; that the abomination of killing kine should be prohibited throughout the Cabul dominions, and in the Afghan armies ; that whatever money, jewels, or cannon should be taken from the Barukzye chiefs, should be divided equally between the Shah and the Maharaja, and "that the portals, made of sandal, which had been carried away to Ghuzni, from the temple of Juggernat (Somnat), shall be delivered to the Maharaja, when the Shah's government is well established." These hard and unfeeling terms, to which other humiliating conditions were annexed, must have convinced the Shah how little sincere friendship he could expect from a man whom his agent, nevertheless, saluted as "one of the greatest persons of the age."

In his reply to these demands, the Shah courteously eluded the proposal for a meeting, as well as that for the attendance of the heir-apparent at the Sikh capital, "because the world would consider the prince in the light of a hostage;" but with respect to the other conditions, he either assented to them in terms, or tacitly, by agreeing to make them matters of negotiation hereafter; excepting two, namely, the prohibition of the slaughter of kine, and that relating to the gates of sandal wood. The Shah's observations upon the latter demand furnish an amusing specimen of the dexterity of Asiatic diplomacy. His Majesty declared the proposition inadmissible on two grounds: "First, a real friend is interested in the good name of his friend; the Maharaja being my friend, how can he find satisfaction in my disgrace? Secondly, there is a tradition, that the forefathers of the Sikhs have said that their nation shall, in the attempt to bring away the portals of sandal, advance to Ghuzni, but having arrived there, the foundation of their empire shall be overthrown. I am not desirous of that event; I wish for the permanence of his highness's dominion."

With these two exceptions, the treaty actually concluded between the parties, on the 12th March, 1833, embraced all the severe conditions required by Runjeet. The Shah disclaimed all title, on the part of himself, his heirs and successors, to whatever territories were in the possession of the Maharaja on either bank of the Indus, viz. Cashmere (including its limits east, west, north, and south); the fort of Attock; Chuch (an extensive plain to the east of Attock); Khebel (N.E. of Attock); Amb (or Ambar, a town on the right bank of the Indus, southward of Dera Ghazi Khan), with its dependencies on the left bank of the river; Peshawur, with the Yusufzai territory;* Kheteks; Husht-

Munkerah (in the Sind-sagur Doab), and the province of Multan. The original draft of the treaty contained an agreement for the equal division "of the territories of the Sindians and others;" but in the executed treaty there is a stipulation that, "regarding Shikarpore, and the territory of Sinde lying on the right bank of the Indus," the Shah shall abide by "whatever may be considered as right and proper, in conformity with the happy relations of friendship subsisting between the British Government and the Maharaja, through Captain Wade." The treaty further pledges the Shah to allow no one to cross the Indus without the Maharaja's permission, and stipulates that each party shall address the other on terms of equality.

This treaty (which was renewed in the tripartite treaty of 1838), although dated in March, was not ratified by Runjeet Singh till August, when the temporary success of the Shah seemed to render it the policy of the former to do so, and it was artfully kept from the knowledge of the British agent till June, 1834, when its provisions became, for the present, nugatory. It secured to the Sikh ruler, as Captain Wade observes,* "not only the entire sovereignty of the Punjab, but also of the river Indus, and the territories that immediately bound it on either side, after its escape from Little Tibet, to the confluence of its tributaries at Mittunkote."

Whilst the Shah was thus parting with large tracts of territory and making liberal promises of treasure, he was so poor in credit as to be unable to raise a loan of 20,000*l.*, even on the pledge of his jewels. He made application to the British Government of India for money to equip, as well as military officers to lead, his army; but Lord William Bentinck, then Governor-General, peremptorily refused compliance with either request, distinctly declaring that "the British Government religiously abstains from intermeddling with the affairs of its neighbours when this can be avoided."† His suit to the Meers of Sind was at first more successful. These princes were not released from their former nominal dependence upon the kingdom of Cabul, and they agreed to assist the Shah, upon condition that he should relinquish all claim of sovereignty over Sinde and Shikarpore, and confer it upon them. The Shah does not appear to have bound himself by treaty with the Meers to make this cession; but in their subsequent negotiations with the British Government, they produced releases, written in Korans, signed by Shah Shuja, conferring Sinde and its dependencies upon the Meers, as their property, for ever, and renouncing all claim or pretension to the territory on the part of Cabul.

Having at length raised some funds and collected a small force, the Shah, in January, 1833, emerged from his retreat at Lodiana, crossed the Indus, and established himself at Shikarpore. The Meers having declined to assist him with a large sum of money, which he demanded, the Shah treated them as foes, and defeated the Sindian army, which had marched to drive him from Shikarpore, with great loss. In May, 1834, he advanced towards Candahar, and routed the force of the Sirdars of that city in a pitched battle. The operations of the Shah at this juncture were facilitated by the success of the Sikhs at Peshawur, which drew off the attention of Dost Mahomed Khan of Cabul, and prevented his march to the succour of his brothers. By virtue of the treaty, an army was despatched by Runjeet Singh to Peshawur, which was occupied by Huree Singh, the commander, with little difficulty. According to one authority,* this was accomplished by artifice and stratagem. It is said that Huree Singh made his appearance near Peshawur, apparently for no other purpose than to collect the usual tribute from the Sirdars, which was immediately paid; but he delayed his departure on various pretexts, and finally obtained permission for Prince Nou Nehal Singh, who was in the rear, to make a friendly visit to the city. In the character of attendants, a large body of the Sikh army was admitted, and the Sirdars being unprepared, the place was taken. Other accounts, however, state that the capture of the city was favoured by the disaffection which was then entertained by many persons of influence towards Sooltan Mahomed Khan, who had become embroiled with the family of one of his wives, by whose means, moreover, the Sikhs established themselves in Kohat, and other parts of the country.

In June, 1834, Dost Mahomed Khan marched to Candahar, then besieged by Shah Shuja, whom he attacked and totally defeated, and this unfortunate monarch, the very plaything of fortune, after encountering many perils, and enduring severe privations, returned to his asylum at Lodiana.

Flushed with his success over the Shah, and highly exasperated at the treacherous capture of Peshawur, the Ameer of Cabul uttered threats of vengeance against the Sikh ruler, vowing to expel his troops beyond the Indus, and even to invade the Punjab. He endeavoured to rouse the passions of the Mahomedans against the infidels, and to embitter the contest by mingling religious antipathies with political rivalry. Runjeet, on his part, made formidable preparations, and reinforced his army at Peshawur, which now amounted to 25,000 men.

Whilst the Maharaja was thus extending his authority beyond the Indus, he was not without disquietude respecting Cashmere, where the severity of his exactions, and the abuses to which they gave rise in a remote dependency, had produced withering effects, and at length excited an insurrection, in which the Sikh governor, Meean Singh, was killed. Runjeet had meditated a journey to the valley in 1833, in order to reform the administration there; but his health had now become precarious; rheumatism settled in his limbs and he laboured under general debility. His French officers, General Ventura and General Allard, apprehensive probably of his approaching dissolution, desired to return to Europe at this time, but he refused to part with them.

In the early part of 1835, Dost Mahomed Khan commenced his operations against Peshawur. A strong body of Afghans, under Mahomed Akhbar Khan, marched to Jelalabad, whence parties were despatched into the Peshawur and Kohat districts. Various encounters took place, in one of which Huree Singh,* one of Runjeet's ablest generals, a man of fierce temper, who had rendered himself peculiarly obnoxious to the Musulmans, was worsted with severe loss. No serious affair, however, occurred, neither party being anxious, apparently, to bring the contest to an issue. Runjeet, having proceeded with some reinforcements, in April, 1835, to Rotas, hearing there that the Ameer of Cabul had arrived before Peshawur, crossed the Indus, and marched thither. The two armies were drawn up in order of battle, when Dost Mahomed Khan, finding that his force was inferior in numbers, as well as discipline, to that of his antagonist, deemed it prudent not to risk a battle, and retired (11th May), hastily and ingloriously, pursued by the Sikhs to the mouth of the Khybur pass. His brother, the ex-Sirdar of Peshawur, upon this, made terms with Runjeet, who settled jagirs upon him and his family, but required that he (Sooltan Mahomed Khan) should accompany him to Lahore, holding out hopes that, if he did so, he should be reinstated in his former authority. But Runjeet, when at Peshawur, made arrangements for the permanent occupation of the country, and left General Avitabili* in command there, whose vigorous

* His personal prowess is mentioned p. 55. Mr. Vigne says Huree shewed him the sword with which he killed the tiger.

* General Avitabili, a Neapolitan, according to Baron Hügel, formerly an officer of Murat's army and court, and a pupil of the Polytechnic School at Paris, entered Runjeet's service in 1830, and was at first appointed governor of Vuzeerabad; while there, he almost rebuilt the town in the European style, making the streets wide enough to admit a carriage with four horses, and introducing other improvements, to the astonishment of the natives. His government of Peshawur is thus spoken of by Major Lawrence (Adv. in the Punjab, vol. i. p. 43): "Of Avitabili the most lenient view that can be taken is, to consider him as set in authority over savage animals,—not as a ruler over reasonable beings; as one appointed to grind down a race, who bear the yoke with about as good a grace as 'a wild bull in a net,' and who, catching their ruler for one moment asleep, would soon cease to be governed. But the ground of complaint alleged against him is, that he 'acts as a savage among savage men,' instead of shewing them that a Christian can wield the iron sceptre without staining it by needless cruelty; without following some of the worst fashions of his worst neighbours. Under his rule, summary hangings have

have been added to the native catalogue of punishments, and not a bad one either when properly used ; but the ostentation of adding two or three to the string suspended from the gibbet, on special days and festivals, added to a very evident habitual carelessness of life, lead one to fear that small pains are taken to distinguish between innocence and guilt, and that many a man, ignorant of the alleged crime, pays with his life the price of blood. It is the general's system, when, as often happens, a Sikh, or any other of his own men, disappears at or near any village in the Peshawur territory, to fine that village, or to make it give up the murderer or murderers. The latter is the cheapest plan ; a victim or victims are given up, and justice is satisfied. He might be as energetic and summary as he pleased, and no one would object to his dealing with a lawless people in such a way as to restrain their evil practices ; but such scenes as frequently occur in the streets of Peshawur, equally revolting to humanity and decency, might be dispensed with. Still, General Avitabili has many of the attributes of a good ruler ; he is bold, active, and intelligent, seeing every thing with his own eyes ; up early and late. He has, at the expense of his own character for humanity, by the terror of his name, saved much life. It is but just to state, that the peaceful and well-disposed inhabitants of Peshawur, both Hindu and Mahomedan, united in praise of his administration, though all with one voice declared that mercy seldom mingled in his decrees. Believed to fear neither man nor devil, continued to harass the Sikh garrison for years afterwards. It is said that Runjeet made an offer to Dost Mahomed Khan of a jagir of 30,000*l.* a year, on condition that he would relinquish all claim to Peshawur, and cease to molest the Sikh troops, and that this offer was at first received favourably, though afterwards declined.

The possession of Peshawur, except as a step to further acquisitions, does not appear to have been advantageous to Runjeet Singh. According to Burnes, it was a drain upon the finances of Lahore, with the additional evil of leading the Sikhs into constant collision with the fierce tribes in the neighbourhood.

Avitabili keeps down by grim fear what nothing else would keep down—the unruly spirits around him, who, if let slip, would riot in carnage; his severity may, therefore, be extenuated, as the least of two evils. Avitabili's whole system of morals is oriental, avowedly eschewing force, when artifice can gain the point, and looking on subjects as made to be squeezed. In person he is tall and stout, with bushy beard, whiskers, and moustache, marked with the small-pox, and with a countenance exhibiting at times the workings of human passion, but again lighted up into even a pleasing expression. With little education, but strong natural sense and ability, he has acquired a good knowledge of Persian and of the Punjabi dialect. Strangely influencing those around him, and influenced by them, his history is a curious study, and, when his own generation has passed away, will hardly be believed."

In July, 1835, the constitution of Runjeet sustained severe injury from an attack of paralysis, from which, however, he partially recovered before the Dussera. These successive bodily affections did not impair the mental energies of this extraordinary man. He renewed his negotiations with Shah Shuja for placing him upon the throne, or rather for employing him as an instrument of annoyance to Dost Mahomed Khan. He disclosed the hostile design he had long entertained against Sind. He demanded from the Meers a tribute of ten lakhs of rupees (100,000*l.*); and a force was sent in advance, which captured Rojhan, the chief town of the Mazari tribe of Balooches, and carried by assault a fort garrisoned by Sindian troops in the neighbourhood of Shikarpore. Preparations were made by him for opening the campaign on a more extensive scale, when the British Government interposed, offering the Meers its mediation, and, upon certain terms, its protection against the Sikhs, and intimating to Runjeet Singh, in explicit terms, its sentiments respecting his aggressive policy. Far from resenting this interference, the Maharaja immediately abandoned his designs, assuring our agent, in terms evincing his usual cordiality and confidence, that he would give immediate orders for the discontinuance of hostilities with Sind, and for withdrawing his troops from the country. He was suffered, however, to retain the town of Rojhan.

Meanwhile, Runjeet was pushing his conquests in the hill country. By means of Gholab Singh, the Raja of Jummoo, he made encroachments upon the state of Iskardo (Little Tibet), Ladakh, and almost to the confines of the Chinese empire, which exercises a nominal authority as far as the sources of the Punjab rivers.

In 1836, General Ventura was invested with the title of Commander-in-Chief of the Sikh army. His appointment was galling to the great sirdars, but in fact the general's authority was little more than nominal. In the same year, Runjeet gave satisfaction to the British Government by issuing an order abolishing slavery throughout his dominions.

He, however, retained to the last female slaves in his own establishment, as singers and dancers.

With the view of engaging our Government indirectly to support his dynasty, in the early part of the succeeding year, Runjeet Singh invited the Commander-in-Chief of the British forces in India (the late Sir Henry Fane) to be present at the nuptials of his grandson, Nou Nehal Singh, son of Khuruk Singh, which were celebrated with great magnificence at Amritsur, on the 7th of March. Sir Henry went, accompanied by two squadrons of lancers, ten companies of infantry, and six pieces of horse artillery, and met with a princely entertainment from the Sikh sovereign, who went through, in the presence of his guest, the imposing ceremony of receiving the compliments and offerings of his great vassals. The bride, who was ten years of age, brought a royal dower (though her father was only a sirdar), consisting of eleven elephants, 101 horses, the same number of camels, with carriages, shawls, jewels, &c. An important part of the marriage ritual consisted in placing over the bridegroom's head a rich veil of pearls and gems strung on gold thread, in which the British commander was invited to afford his auspicious assistance. The Maharaja was in high spirits, active, energetic, and inquisitive, and in spite of his infirm health, indulged in potations of strong drink to an extent which astonished his English visitors.

The hostilities between the Sikhs and Afghans had continued in Peshawur, with varying success. In 1836, Sher Singh, the son of Runjeet, had a sanguinary encounter with the chief of Lalpoora, in which both parties suffered severely; and in June an action took place between a large body of Kuzzilbashes and Ghiljies, under Dost Mahomed Khan, and a Sikh army, under Nou Nehal Singh, in which the Afghans were victorious, the Sikhs being completely beaten. But in June, 1837, a more serious affair occurred.

Huree Singh, the commander of the Sikh forces at Peshawur, commenced the erection of a strong fort at Jumrood, in the mouth of the Khybur pass, with the view of bridling the tribes which guarded that terrific inlet, and of securing a passage to Cabul. Dost

Mahomed Khan perceived that an effort must be made to stop the progress of this work, and, if possible, to crush his dangerous neighbours; he accordingly prepared a force of 8,000 (some accounts say 15,000) horse and foot, with fifty pieces of artillery, which he placed under the nominal command of his son, the since well-known Mahomed Akhbar Khan; but the operations were directed by Abdul Summund Khan. The fierce mountain tribes were ready to co-operate with this force, and the courage of the troops was stimulated by fanaticism to an unusual degree of ferocity. The Sikhs appear to have been nearly equal in numbers to their antagonists; nevertheless, they intrenched themselves; but on the 22nd of June, they marched out to battle. The conflict was severe, and the victory for some time balanced; cannon was taken and retaken on both sides; the Afghans, however, acknowledge that on this day they were worsted. The success of the Sikhs was counterbalanced by the loss of their commander, Huree Singh, who was mortally wounded, and died the day after. Both armies passed the night on the battle-field ; and on the 23rd, the attack was renewed by the Sikhs, who took several pieces of cannon from the Afghans, and threw them into disorder ; but, according to the Sikh reports, the soldiers, believing the victory to be won, could not resist the temptation to plunder ; whereupon a reserve corps, under a young Englishman, named Rattray,* with

* Lieutenant Wood (Journey to the Oxus, p. 159) gives the following account of Lieutenant-Colonel Rattray : “ We wound up the pass to the fort of Ali Masjid, and were there received by its commandant, an ill-conditioned, dissipated-looking Englishman ; slipshod, turbaned, and robed in a sort of Afghan dishabille, having more the look of a dissipated priest than a military man. His abode was a cave in the mountain, from which he and his hungry followers levied black mail on the passing kafilas. Lieutenant-Colonel Rattray received us at the head of his column, which, drawn up for the occasion, had something approaching to a military look ; but no sooner did the commandant attempt a manœuvre, than a most ludicrous scene ensued. In utter hopelessness of restoring his scattered legion to order, he disbanded it forthwith, and then the Lieutenant-Colonel commenced whacking his men with a cudgel ; but he was soon overwhelmed by numbers, and compelled to desist. Some time after this, when we were in Cabul, this man became a convert to Mahomedanism, much against the wish of Dost Mahomed Khan, who artillery, seized the critical moment, rushed upon the enemy, and the disordered and retreating Afghans, being thus enabled to rally, the Sikhs were broken and fled to their intrenchments. Here they were enabled to maintain themselves against reiterated assaults for four days, till the arrival of General Allard, who advanced by forced marches, with reinforcements (Runjeet having made great preparations apparently for conquests in Afghanistan, which he had pushed forward); and upon his junction with the Sikh army, the Afghans retreated through the pass to Jelallabad. Both parties suffered severely in this conflict; about 7,000 men are said to have fallen. The Afghans acknowledged their loss to be 1,500, including a son of Dost Mahomed Khan, and several who thought him a disgrace to any creed, and expressed in strong terms the contempt he felt for men who could change their religion to improve their fortune. chiefs ; that of the Sikhs was much greater, but the accounts are irreconcilable. The savage rancour of the belligerents towards each other, inflamed by religious antipathies, permitted no quarter to be given on either side ; all who surrendered were put to death on the spot. When Lieutenant Wood entered the pass a few months after this event, he beheld Sikh scalps exhibited in the middle of the road, trophies of the field of Jumrood.

The news of this disaster, which, however, had no other result than to elate and intoxicate the Afghans,* and still further to exasperate the parties against each other, confounded Runjeet Singh, who told Captain Wade that he would be glad to give up Peshawur if he could save his purdah (honour); and Mr.

* Although Dost Mahomed Khan entertained a deep hatred towards Runjeet Singh, as a rival and a Sikh, he appears, from the despatches of Captain Burnes, to have acknowledged his own inferiority. "My sons and people," he said to Captain Burnes, "may speak in exaggerated terms of our late success, but it is too evident that our power is not one-tenth of that of the Punjab."

Masson* says that, in September, 1837, Captain Wade wrote to him that the Sikh ruler was ready to come to an amicable adjustment on reasonable terms. The Maharaja proceeded in person to the frontier, but, finding that his presence was unnecessary, he returned to Lahore, much incensed against his generals, to whose misconduct and cowardice he attributed the disgrace of his arms. It has been stated that he seized all the property left by Huree Singh (eighty lakhs of rupees, or about 800,000/.), whose family was suffered to fall into poverty.†

About this time, in imitation of European customs, Runjeet adopted the cheap expedient of rewarding military merit by establishing a military order, called the "Auspicious Star of the Punjab," the decorations of which he conferred upon some

British officers. Towards the end of 1837, he was prevailed upon to redeem his pledge of nominating the Barukzye sirdar, Sooltan Mahomed Khan, ruler of Peshawur, or rather, his representative there.

CHAPTER XVIII.

A.D. 1838 AND 1839.

WE now approach the period of an important transaction, the restoration of Shah Shuja, by the joint aid of the British Government and the Maharaja of the Punjab. It is unnecessary to discuss in this place the policy of that measure, or the motives which prevailed with those who were intrusted with the guardianship of British interests in the East, to depart from the non-intervention principles which forbade Lord William Bentinck to countenance the expedition of Shah Shuja in 1833, and led them to consider that "we owed it to our own safety to assist the lawful sovereign of Afghanistan in the recovery of his throne."* It may be sufficient to say, that the anti-English feelings cherished by the Shah of

* Correspondence relative to Afghanistan, 1839, No. 4, p. 7.

Persia, the supposed designs of Russia, the activity of the agents of that power in Central Asia, and the predilection of Dost Mahomed Khan for a Russian alliance, in opposition to the views of England,—in which the Ameer was greatly biassed by our intimate relations with his bitter enemy, Runjeet Singh,—appeared to warrant the enterprise, in order to “arrest the rapid progress of foreign intrigue and aggression towards our own territories,” and to secure our western frontier, by having there an ally who is interested in the maintenance of tranquillity, “in the place of chiefs ranging themselves in subservience to a hostile power, and seeking to promote schemes of conquest and aggrandizement.”* The Declaration of the British Indian Government, which assigns these motives, adverts likewise to the “sudden and unprovoked attack,” recently made by Dost Mahomed Khan, upon the territory of “our ancient ally, Maharaja Runjeet Singh;” the Dost’s virtual refusal of our mediation, and the “most unreasonable pretensions” set up by him (namely, for the relinquishment of the Peshawur territory), as the basis of an arrangement between them, "such as the Governor-General could not, consistently with justice and his regard for the friendship of Maharaja Runjeet Singh, be the channel of introducing to the consideration of his highness."

After the rupture of the negotiations carried on with Dost Mahomed Khan, through the intervention of Captain Burnes, but before the retreat of the Persians from Herat, Lord Auckland, in a Minute* which preceded the Declaration, took a view of our past policy in respect to Afghanistan, which shews the importance he attached to the preservation of friendly relations with Runjeet Singh, a consideration which, no doubt, had great influence in the choice of the alternatives, namely, adopting the cause of Shah Shuja, or that of Dost Mohamed Khan. His lordship observed, that more direct aid to Herat was not in our power, and direct interference would have been opposed to the positive engagements of treaty; that arms supplied to the Barukzye chiefs of Cabul and Candahar would have been, more probably, used against the Sikhs than against Persia; that the Ameer of Cabul would not move but on condition of the cession of Peshawur; and that relations with him, whilst such pretensions were advanced, would have destroyed the cordiality of our alliance with "the most powerful and valuable of our friends, Runjeet Singh."

The original design of our Government seems to have been to promote the success of the Shah by every means short of direct interference, but to leave the military operations in the hands of the Sikh ruler. It has been asserted, that Runjeet evinced some reluctance to enter into the project, and that he was at last induced, very unwillingly, to become a party to the tripartite treaty. Be that as it may, in August, 1838, Lord Auckland determined "to give the direct and powerful assistance of the British Government to the enterprise of Shah Shuja, in a degree which was not at first contemplated by him, from a conviction, confirmed in the most decided manner by every opinion of authority on the subject, that the measure could not be trusted mainly to the support of the Sikh ruler and army, without imminent hazard of failure, and of serious detriment to the reputation of the British name amongst the Afghan people.”*

The project was first opened to Runjeet Singh. A complimentary deputation having been sent by the Maharaja to the Governor-General at Simla, consisting of some of the most distinguished Sikh chiefs, Lord Auckland resolved to send a mission, ostensibly to reciprocate the compliments, but really to treat respecting the state of affairs beyond the north-west frontier of India. This mission† was conducted by Mr. (the late Sir William) Macnaghten, who proceeded to the court of the Maharaja, and reached his camp, at Adenanugur, on the 28th May. Two marches from this place, the mission was met by Pertab Singh (a boy of seven years of age), son of Sher Singh, and grandson of Runjeet, who had been sent by his father to accompany the mission through his district.

* Letter to Secret Committee, 13th August, 1838.

† An account of this mission is given in the Hon. W. G. Osborne's "Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh."

According to precedent and custom, Sher Singh himself should have been sent; but it is supposed that Runjeet was jealous of European influence over his family and chiefs, and, according to Mr. Osborne, an excuse was assigned for this breach of etiquette which is highly characteristic of the manners of the Lahore court; namely, that the Shah-zadeh Sher Singh, in consequence of having been overcome at a drinking party with the Maharaja, on the evening before, was unable to travel.

The negotiations, it appears, went on less smoothly than was expected; Runjeet made the proposal a pretext for demanding a variety of concessions which could not be complied with. It is understood, that he insisted so pertinaciously upon having Shikarpore, as the price of his co-operation, that the negotiation was on the point of being broken off, till at length he was prevailed upon to accept a payment of two lakhs of rupees by the Shah, guaranteed by the British Government, in lieu of the cession. Accordingly, in the tripartite treaty, amongst the additions to the treaty of 1833, is an article under which Shah Shuja engaged to pay, after his restoration, two lakhs of rupees,* from the date on which the Sikh troops may be despatched for the purpose of reinstating the Shah, in consideration of the Maharaja stationing a force of 5,000 men (Mahomedans) in the Peshawur territory, for the support of the Shah. Another additional article stipulates that, of the tribute to be paid by the Meers of Sinde to Shah Shuja, fifteen lakhs should be made over to Runjeet Singh.

Upon the return of the mission from Lahore, a communication was made to Shah Shuja, who readily executed the tripartite treaty of 26th June, 1838, which was the same as that of 1833, with the additions just mentioned.

Preparatory to the commencement of the campaign, an interview took place between the Governor-General of British India (Lord Auckland) and the Maharaja of the Punjab, on the 29th November, 1838, at Ferozepore. Runjeet Singh paid the first visit, crossing the Sutluj with his court in all the pomp and splendour of an Eastern potentate. He was met by the representative of the British nation, accompanied by Sir Henry Fane, the Commander-in-Chief, and a numerous suite. At the meeting, Lord Auckland received his royal visitor into the hounda of his elephant, and embraced him, under a royal salute; and they proceeded to the tent of the Governor-General, through an avenue of 4,000 British troops, the scene realizing (says an eye-witness) all the fabled descriptions of Oriental magnificence. Upon reaching the inclosure, Lord Auckland and Sir Henry Fane, dismounting, handed down the Maharaja, whose feeble motions contrasted strongly with his quick eye and earnest and intelligent expression. Entering the Durbar tent, Runjeet took a seat on the same couch with the Honourable Miss Eden (the sister of Lord Auckland), having the Governor-General on his right, and addressed the lady on a few topics happily chosen, Major Wade interpreting. The tent presented an extraordinary scene, being filled almost to suffocation with English generals and Sikh sirdars, ladies and matchlock men, English civilians in plain dresses, and Punjabi ministers in chain and plated armour, all crammed together. After enduring the agony with polite patience for some time, Runjeet was at length escorted by Lord Auckland and Sir Henry Fane to an audience-tent, where only a select number was admitted. Here the presents were exhibited, and amongst them a portrait of Queen Victoria, painted by Miss Eden, in a frame of solid gold. On receiving this picture, Runjeet bowed his head, and, in a graceful manner, pressed the portrait to his lips, declaring that it was the most acceptable gift he could receive,* and that he should suspend it in his tent under a salute of 101 guns.

The Maharaja was then conducted from the tent to view the elephants, horses, camel battery, howitzers, and other artillery, forming part of the presents; and here an incident happened, which the superstitious Asiatics interpreted as an unfavourable omen. Some spherical cases had been piled up in front of the howitzers, which, owing to the confusion and crowd, were not observed, and over them the Maharaja stumbled and fell, Sir Henry Fane doing the same. The latter soon recovered himself, and raised Runjeet, who treated the matter as a trifle, notwithstanding his bodily infirmities, as well as the ominous aspect of the occurrence.

At the conclusion of the interview, which lasted two hours, the Maharaja returned with the same pomp and honours as he came.

On the following day, the visit was returned, and it is admitted that the Sikhs fairly outshone the representative of the English court. A body of British cavalry (including the 16th Lancers) crossed the Sutluj, and took up a station on the right bank of the river, at the foot of the bridge of boats. Lord Auckland, accompanied by his suite of civil and military officers, left his tents at sunrise, and proceeded on their elephants, under a salute of artillery, towards the river, a distance of about three miles. The procession had not moved more than a few hundred yards before it was met by Sher Singh (Runjeet's second son), with Dhean Singh, the prime minister, several rajas and sirdars, attended by a body of cavalry and infantry. The march was extremely picturesque, from the variety, as well as richness, of the different costumes and arms. When the procession crossed the river, and moved up an avenue formed by the British cavalry, it presented a grand spectacle, whilst batteries were firing, drums beating, and trumpets sounding. A discharge of distant artillery announced that the Maharaja had left his tents, and in a few minutes the opposite pageant came in sight, when the scene is represented to have been beyond the power of verbal description, and surpassing all that European imagination had conceived of even oriental luxury and splendour. Between the ranks of horsemen gorgeously arrayed, with steel casques and glittering appointments, moved in majestic order towards each other two masses of elephants, bearing in rich houdas the two greatest rulers in India, surrounded by their ministers and warriors. Columns after columns of troops were seen, in every variety of gay colours, covered with a profusion of ornaments, preserving a steadiness which the best European discipline could not excel, whilst to the east and west stretched an extensive encampment, in the centre of which were numerous tents, glittering in crimson and gold. At viewing distance from the Sikh legions, were dense masses of spectators of the humble classes, maintaining a silence and decorum scarcely ever shewn in the most civilized countries of Europe, as if the rules of military discipline had made some impression upon the habits of civil life. No tumultuous shouts rent the air; none of those bursts of rude, though hearty, exultation, which are not repressed in Europe; the silent awe or breathless astonishment of the masses was only occasionally broken by the licensed tongue of an Akali or a fakir. The processions met and mingled. The Maharaja, on a ponderous elephant, was habited, as on the day before, in a dark crimson shawl-cloth tunic, trowsers, and turban, without any trinkets, and was thus, as well as by his flowing white beard, distinguished from his richly-clad sirdars and attendants. Lord Auckland, who wore the blue and gold uniform of an English minister of state, entered the Maharaja's hounda, amidst the clangor of trumpets and the roar of cannon, and the united procession moved on, in a majestic pace, to the durbar-tents. Upon their arrival there, bands of Sikh musicians, admirably trained, struck up our national anthem. The tents were inclosed within a vast area of crimson cloth walls, nine feet high, decorated with yellow lace (Runjeet's favourite bussuntee colour); and within this inclosure were drawn up in order about 2,000 of the Maharaja's household troops, in crimson silk, or elegant kingcaub dresses, armed with polished matchlocks and shields. Alighting in this magnificent inclosure, where the order and silence presented a striking contrast to the confusion and pressure which had been permitted in the English tents, the Maharaja conducted Lord Auckland and Sir Henry Fane, and their suites, to the durbar-tent, which was a splendidly carpeted floor, on which were numerous gold and silver chairs, covered in by a spacious sumeeana, lined with shawl-cloth. Here the introductions took place, and when they were over, a band of nautch-girls, covered with jewellery and glistening with silver-dust, performed their singular movements, and then the presents were produced. The departure of the Governor-General was honoured with a royal salute.

Shortly after this interview, Lord Auckland visited Amritsur and Lahore. At the former place, the Maharaja's hospitality and confidence were unbounded. The party were admitted into the chief temple, where Lord Auckland (the first European who had been so indulged) sat side by side with Runjeet Singh on the same carpet, listening to the lecture of the Grant'h, the secretaries, generals, and suite (including the Misses Eden), sitting or standing around. Amongst other ceremonies, an offering was made to the temple on that occasion.* The Maharaja conducted his visitor to Govind-gurh. It was not expected by Lord Auckland that he would have been admitted within this important fortress; but, to the surprise of all, and the chagrin and anger of many Sikhs, Runjeet threw open the gates, and led the party over the whole, pointing out the vaults which contained his treasures (reported to be £12,000,000 sterling), which had been hitherto concealed from all but initiated Sikhs of high rank. It was observed that Runjeet had strengthened the walls both of the city and the fort, substituting brick for mud in the curtains and bastions.

At Lahore, where Lord Auckland arrived on the 21st December, the entertainments were on a scale of princely magnificence and truly oriental luxury. Runjeet insisted that his lordship should take his part in drinking, requiring each time that he should drain the cup of fiery liquid* he presented to the

* This wine was extracted from raisins, a quantity of pearls being ground to powder and mixed with it. It was made for Runjeet alone, and though he sometimes gave a few bottles to some of his favourite chiefs, it was very difficult to be procured even at the enormous price of a gold mohur for a small bottle. "It is as strong as aquafortis," Mr. Osborne says (p. 189), "and as at his parties he always helps you himself, it is no easy dregs. The excess committed by the Maharaja on this occasion,—he had been prevailed upon by his English medical attendant to live abstemiously,—produced a severe fit of apoplexy, and when Lord Auckland took leave of him, he was lying on his couch, scarcely able to articulate. It is said that when his lordship presented his host with a valuable jewel, his eye lighted up with all its wonted fire.

Prior to the meeting at Ferozepore, attempts were made by those about Runjeet, who were adverse to the British, to infuse distrust and suspicion into his mind, and doubts were expressed whether he would visit the Governor-General at such a distance in the British territory, the place of meeting being three miles from the river. His confidence in British honour, however, resisted these efforts, and he even went two miles further to be present at a review of easy matter to avoid excess. The only food allowed you at these drinking bouts is fat quails stuffed with all sorts of spices, and the only thing to allay your thirst, naturally consequent upon eating such heating food, is this abominable liquid fire."

13,000 of our troops, forming part of the army of the Indus, on the 3rd December, when he appeared much struck with the manœuvres of this fine force.

The friendly feelings, which this personal intercourse confirmed, removed the reluctance, if it ever existed, in the mind of the Maharaja, to allow our troops a passage through the Punjab, in their march to Afghanistan. In the course of this year he gave a fresh proof of his sentiments, by refusing in open durbar to receive a communication from the Nepal Raja, on the ground that he and the British Government were friends, and that their enemies were his enemies.

Runjeet appears to have heartily co-operated in the execution of the tripartite treaty; and the inefficiency of the services rendered by his troops at Peshawur, where, however, the resistance was much greater than at Candahar and Ghuzni, is attributed to disobedience of his orders, and the jealousy of his son and sirdars. Captain (now Sir Claude Martin) Wade was appointed by the British Government to act with the Sikh army at Peshawur, whither Runjeet sent an imposing force, under Nou Nehal Singh, leaving his own Sutluj frontier open to us; whilst all his stores of cattle and grain were at the disposal of the British.

The life of Runjeet Singh was now drawing to a close. Although the remaining vigour of his wonderful constitution had partially recovered the paralytic attack which had seized him during Lord Auckland's visit, he lost the power of speech, though he retained his other faculties. "A curious and interesting sight it was now," says one authority,* "to behold the fast-decaying monarch, his mind still alive, by signs giving his orders; still receiving reports, and, assisted by the faithful fakir Uzeez-ud-deen,† almost as usual, attending

* Calcutta Review, No. II. p. 476.

† Uzeez-ud-deen, by birth a barber, became first attached to the household of Runjeet in this capacity, as well as in that of hakim, or doctor, the two functions being united in the East as formerly in the West. Being a smart, bold young fellow, intelligent and of insinuating manners, he gained Runjeet's notice, and obtained a small jagir. When Mr. Metcalfe came to the Sikh durbar, on an unpalatable errand, in 1808, all Runjeet's to affairs of state. By a slight turn of his hand to the south, he would inquire the news from the British frontier; by a similar turn to the west, he would demand tidings from the invading army; and most anxious was he for intelligence from Afghanistan, doubting the success of the English measure, seeing his own advantage in their councillors advised an appeal to the sword, except the hakim and one Purupteal (who died soon after), and they strenuously dissuaded him from a collision with the British. Runjeet followed their advice, and ever after gave Uzeez-ud-deen his fullest confidence, which he retained for thirty years. Being descended from the Ansari Arabs, and his family being fakirs, he took that title, and became the most confidential adviser of Runjeet, as well as his physician, possessing more influence over him than even Dhean Singh. He is a fine-looking man, with agreeable features, and now about fifty-five. His next brother, Noor-ud-deen, was intrusted with the command of the city of Lahore, and likewise enjoyed Runjeet's confidence. He was the owner of the manufactory of distilled waters, essences, and medicines, and superintended the magazines and public buildings. A younger brother, named Imam-ud-deen (who is now blind), was made governor of Govind-gurh, an office which, after his blindness, was executed by his son, Taj-ed-deen. All three brothers are men of remarkable intelligence and very agreeable manners.

failure, and yet unwilling or afraid to withdraw from his engagements." So deep were the feelings of respect he had inspired, that the most implicit obedience was paid to every wish he expressed, though his end was evidently near. Several times he was taken from his charpae (bedstead) and laid on the floor to die, but he rallied again. In the hot weather of 1839, he had applied for a British physician, and Dr. Steele was sent; but his case was a hopeless one; dropsy, attended by fever, had made rapid inroads, and defied the power of medicine.

When Runjeet became aware of the fatal character of his disorder, he seemed for days to struggle with death, and still clung with mad tenacity to an existence which had now no enjoyment to offer him that he had not exhausted. He had recourse to priests and holy men, whose effectual intervention with heaven, by a perversity of which all countries, in all ages, have furnished examples, he hoped could be purchased by gold. Even his avarice yielded to this exigency, and he lavished with almost wanton prodigality his immense treasures amongst sordid pundits, fakirs, and devotees of all sorts, who flocked from every quarter to Lahore, allured by the liberal prices he paid for prayers. His alms were distributed, without discrimination, amongst Hindus and Nanuk-Shahis, Bramins and Sodees; Gya and Jugernat participated in the spoil with Amritsur and other Sikh shrines. The nearer the dreaded moment seemed to approach, the more eager was his hankering for life, and the more undistinguishing and boundless his profusion. Jagirs were assigned to temples; his elephants, even his beloved horses, were parted with; steeds with jewelled saddles, cows with gilded horns, golden chairs and golden bedsteads, were sent to propitiate the various deities; his pearls and gems, even the jewels which had been recently presented to him by the representative of the British nation, were bartered for even the chance of a few additional moments of existence. It has been computed that, on the day of his death, the wealth bestowed by Runjeet in pious gifts amounted to more than a million sterling. As a last resource, two hours before his death, that matchless diamond, the Koh-i-noor, for the possession of which he had violated the laws of hospitality and perpetrated a cruel robbery, was sent for, to be despatched as a gift to adorn the image of Juggernat; but now his successor, and his ministers and courtiers (who were invaded by fears that nothing would be left for their cupidity), interposed, and represented that such a jewel, which the whole revenue of India could not re-purchase, was an alms too precious to be conferred upon Bramins. The other gifts, however, continued till the evening of the 27th June, 1839, when, after a succession of fainting fits, his mental faculties remaining unimpaired till the last, the Maharaja expired, at the age of fifty-eight.

His death was concealed by the Koonwur (or Prince) Khuruk Singh, Raja Dhean Singh, the minister, and Jemadar Khooshal Singh, until they had taken measures, during the night, for securing the city. In the early part of the month, he had directed his son, Khuruk Singh, to hold durbar, and Dhean Singh, in conjunction with Khuruk Singh, to regulate the affairs of the state, the Vuzeerat being conferred upon the minister, as the second person in the state. On the night of the 20th, the condition of Runjeet being hopeless, it had been resolved that the heir-apparent should be proclaimed successor to the throne, which was done on the following morning, when Khuruk Singh and Dhean Singh took nuzzurs from the commandants of the troops and officers. On the morning of the 28th June, trusty officers having been placed in charge of the ghats on the Sutluj, and patrols disposed about the city, the death of Runjeet and the accession of Khuruk were announced. Raja Dhean Singh acted a strange and unaccountable part on this occasion. He declared his resolution to burn with the body of his late master, and was with difficulty persuaded, after some hours' entreaty, to forego this resolve, the prince and sirdars throwing their turbands at his feet, and declaring that, without him, the affairs of the state would be deranged. He gave way to their importunity only on condition that he should be permitted to visit Benares.

Although the practice of suttee forms no part of the institutions of the Sikhs, and is rare amongst them, upon this occasion, the four ranis of Runjeet, Koondun, daughter of Raja Sunsar Chund; Hinderee, daughter of Meean Puddum Singh, of Noorpur; Rajkoonwur, daughter of Sirdar Jey Singh, of Chynpur, and Baant Ali, determined, in spite of the entreaties and remonstrances of Khuruk Singh and his ministers, who guaranteed their rank and property, to burn.

The corpse of the late Maharaja having been washed with Ganges water, and placed on a bier of sandal wood decorated with gold flowers, was carried, the day after his death, to the place of cremation, before the gates of the palace Hazaree Bagh, followed by the four ranis in their richest dresses, loaded with jewels of immense value, walking in a measured step, attended by Bramins and Sodees (Sikh priests), singing the holy hymns of Nanuk, in the same form, and with the same ceremonies, which were beheld in these very parts (on the banks of the Ravi) by the army of Alexander the Great more than 2,000 years before, and which are described by the Greek and Roman writers* with a minute fidelity, which would suit a modern suttee. The funeral pile was made of sandal wood, and when the procession reached it, an affecting scene took place. Rani Koon-dun, the principal widow, took the hand of Dhean Singh, and placing it on the breast of the corpse, made him swear never to betray or desert Khuruk Singh, or his son Nou Nehal Singh, or forget the interests of the Khalsa; and Khuruk Singh, in like manner, swore not to betray or desert Dhean Singh. Besides the fatal curse of a suttee, the torments incurred by the slaughter of a thousand cows were imprecated on the head of him who violated his oath.

Rani Koondun then mounted the pyre, sat down beside the body of her late husband, which was in a sitting posture, and placed his head in her lap. The other ranis, two of them only sixteen years of age, and of extraordinary beauty, with five, some say seven, Cashmerian slave-girls (one of them the lovely Lotus, who had attracted the admiration of the mission in 1838), followed the example, seating themselves around the corpse, with every token of satisfaction in their countenances. At the hour fixed by the Bramins, in the presence of all the troops at the capital and an immense crowd of spectators, including several English officers, the pile was lighted, one account states by Khuruk Singh, another, by the Rani Koondun, and, without a shriek or groan being heard, the living and the dead were reduced to ashes. It is said that Raja Dhean Singh made four several attempts to jump upon the burning mass, but was withheld by the people about him. A witness of this appalling spectacle relates that a small cloud appeared in the sky over the pile, and that he saw (perhaps thought he saw) a few drops fall upon the smouldering embers, as if the very elements wept at the closing scene of this dismal tragedy.

The ashes were conveyed in a palanquin of gold, in grand procession, accompanied by Khuruk Singh (in a plain white muslin dress), Dhean Singh, and Khooshal Singh, to the Ganges, and committed to that holy river.

Nature was not liberal to Runjeet Singh in personal gifts; one of his disadvantages was a mean-looking aspect, and which, at first sight, was almost repulsive, though this impression speedily wore off. His stature was below the middle size; to Burnes (who says his height did not certainly exceed five feet three inches), he appeared diminutive, and to Major Lawrence, stunted; but as latterly he had an habitual stoop, he probably seemed shorter than he really was. None, however, represent his height as more than five feet seven inches. He was meagre, but had been vigorous and active in youth. His shoulders were broad; his head was square, large in proportion, and somewhat sunk in his shoulders; his neck was thick and muscular; his forehead remarkably broad; his face oval, and much marked with the small-pox, the scars not running into one another, but forming dark pits. The disease had closed the left eye; the remaining eye was large and brown; his nose was short and slightly retroussé, or swollen at the tip; his lips were thin and stretched tight over his teeth, which were good to the last; his complexion was a dark brown; his voice, latterly rough and unpleasant, had been soft and agreeable. When necessary, he could assume a fascinating tone, which operated upon those about him like enchantment. A long white beard and moustaches, latterly thin and matted, gave him an appearance of greater age than he had. "Altogether," says Baron Hügel, "he is the ugliest man I saw throughout the Punjab, and the most forbidding human being I have ever seen." Others (and Mr. H. T. Prinsep in the number) have described his appearance as far from unprepossessing, his countenance having been full of expression and animation.* When, however, the first ill-impression disappeared, no one admitted to the presence of Runjeet Singh could fail to be struck with his extraordinary qualities, his intelligence and acuteness. His penetrating look, the restlessness of his fiery eye, which seemed to dive into the thoughts of the person he conversed with, and the rapidity of his laconic but searching questions, denoted the activity of his mind and his insatiable curiosity. "His conversation," M. Jacquemont says, "was like a night-mare; he is," continues the lively Frenchman, "almost the first really inquisitive Indian I have seen, and his curiosity balances the apathy of the whole of his nation." When he sat in an arm-chair, with his feet drawn under him, the position was peculiarly unfavourable for him; but as soon as he mounted his horse, which he managed with ease, even after his right side was affected with paralysis, his whole form seemed animated by the spirit within, and assumed a grace of which no one before thought it susceptible. When he had become weak, he adopted a singular method of mounting the tall horses on which he loved to ride. A man knelt down before him, and he threw his leg over his neck, when the man rose, with the Maharaja upon his shoulders, and approached the horse. Runjeet then, putting his right foot into the stirrup, and holding by the horse's mane, threw his left leg over the man's head and the back of the horse into the stirrup on the other side. He dressed plainly, wearing few ornaments, though he took pleasure in seeing his courtiers and dependants in rich dresses, and his durbar was very splendid. He did not use a gudi or throne; "my sword," he observed, "procures for me all the distinction I desire, and I am quite indifferent to external pomp." He was quite unreserved in all his habits; his diet consisted of high stimulants, of which he partook sparingly. His deportment was easy and dignified, and his manners, generally speaking, were polished. M. Jacquemont has recorded * a gross act of impropriety, of which, he says, Runjeet was guilty, in the presence of Lord William Bentinck and his whole court.

* The difference of age, at the periods of interview, will account for much of this inconsistency. The likeness of Runjeet, given by Captain Osborne, from a drawing by Miss Eden, fully justifies the Baron's description; while that in Mr. H. T. Prinsep's Life of Runjeet, from a painting by a native artist, warrants his more favourable portraiture.

The character and policy of this remarkable personage deserve to be considered in a separate chapter.

CHAPTER XIX.

CHARACTER AND POLICY OF RUNJEET SINGH.

RUNJEET SINGH has been likened to Mehemet Ali and to Napoleon. M. Jacquemont terms him, "a Bonaparte in miniature." There are some points in which he resembles both ; but, estimating his character with reference to his circumstances and position, he is, perhaps, a more remarkable man than either. The worst parts of his personal character may be traced to the accidents of country and education, or rather want of education ; his best qualities belonged to himself.

He was not only uninstructed in any branch of learning or science, but absolutely illiterate ; he could not even read or write ; whilst unlimited means were afforded to him by his mother, in early youth, of plunging into dissipation, gratifying every passion, and even the most irregular desires, at a court and amongst a sect notorious for immorality ; licentiousness and sensuality, of the lowest and basest kinds, being the rule, and sobriety and decency the rare exceptions. At the age of seventeen, whilst pleasure and luxury spread their seductions before him, the affairs of his sirdaree fell into his hands, and the consummate skill with which he overcame the difficulties of his situation, defeated or foiled every antagonist, converted enemies to friends, and made friends subservient to his own purposes, must inspire the reader of the preceding chapters with surprise and wonder, if not with higher emotions. It is difficult to suppress admiration, in contemplating the career of such a man, who, with so many disadvantages, succeeded, with so few crimes, in elevating himself from a simple sirdar, to be the sovereign of a large kingdom, including Hindus and Mahomedans, as well as Sikhs, the only state in India not substantially under British dominion. The character of all Eastern princes must be judged, not by the European, but by the Asiatic standard of morals ; according to which, craft, cunning, artifice, treachery, are reckoned talents, rather than vices, in a statesman; and even barbarous cruelty is pardoned as a means to a politic end.

Although he was unable to read or write in any language, the habit of hearing papers read in Persian, Punjabi, and Hindi, and great assiduity in attention even to the minutiae of business, gave Runjeet a facility in following and understanding for the most part what was submitted to him; so that, although quite unable to appreciate elegancies of style, or to dictate word for word what should be written, he transacted business rapidly, was ready with a short and decided order upon any report or representation read to him, and when the draft of his instruction was prepared in due form, he saw at once whether it fully corresponded with his views. Confidential secretaries were perpetually in attendance, and frequently called up in the night, to expedite orders, as the sudden recollection or caprice of the Maharaja suggested them. With great natural intelligence, and a wonderfully quick apprehension, his memory was excellent, and stored with minute, as well as important, circumstances.

He audited all the revenue accounts, and the tenacity of his memory enabled him to follow the most complicated statements. In his annual circuits through the country, he kept in his mind a register of what he had seen. His disposition was at the same time watchful, and his eye quick and searching, so that nothing escaped his observation; while the perspicacity displayed in his appreciation of character, and in tracing the motives of others' actions, gave him a command and influence over all who approached him, which were mainly instrumental to his rapid rise. With great acuteness, he had a lively imagination; and though never for an instant forgetful of any end he may have had in view, there was a frankness and naïveté about his conversation, peculiarly agreeable. His observations and remarks were given ordinarily in short, terse, incoherent phrases, or in the shape of interrogatories; * but they were such as re-

* When the Adventurer in the Punjab appeared before Runjeet, seeking service, the following discourse took place, which affords a good idea of the style of his interrogatories: "I was asked what I knew, what I could do, and what I wanted—all in a breath. My reply was to the effect that I could do any thing, was ignorant mained fixed in the recollection of the person to whom they were addressed, as uncommon, and displaying an original thinker. His eagerness for information and instruction was unbounded. He had great power of dissimulation, and, under the greatest frankness of manner, and even familiarity, in his intercourse, could veil subtle designs, and even treachery. In action he always shewed himself personally brave and collected, but his plans betrayed no boldness or adventurous hazard. Address and cunning, nay, even corruption, have always been preferred by him, as instruments of success, to any dash of enterprise, calculated to excite admiration or inspire awe. Mr. Moorcroft* relates an anecdote of Runjeet, mentioned by himself, which illustrates this part of his character :—

ignorant of nothing, and having heard the fame of the king, was come from a far country to offer my services. ‘ Can you build a fort ? Can you cure a long-standing disease ? Can you cast a gun ? Can you shoe a horse ? Can you mend my watch, which has stopped ? ’ ”—Vol. i. p. 20.

strong desire to see the European general and his officers. His courtiers endeavoured to dissuade him, affirming that the very sight would be unlucky; but he was determined to gratify himself, and for that purpose disguised himself as a common trooper, and accompanied by a party of his soldiers, repaired to the British camp. They went to Mr. Metcalfe's tent, and sent word that some Sikhs had come out of curiosity to see the Sahibs, and begged he would indulge them. Mr. Metcalfe complied, but soon distinguished Runjeet Singh amongst his visitors." His fertility in expedients was wonderful, and he was never at a loss for a resource in the greatest difficulties; but many of his actions evinced caprice, and even instability of purpose, for the motive of them cannot be traced or imagined. His uniform conduct and career through life prove him to have been selfish, sensual, and licentious: not regardful of the ties of affection, blood, or friendship, in the pursuit of ambition or pleasure; and greedy in a profligate degree, plundering and reducing to misery, without the slightest remorse, widows, orphans, and families possessing claims to consideration and respect ; at the same time, he almost invariably provided for the families of his conquered enemies. In his youth he was lavish in his gifts to favourites, and there was liberality in his general dealings ; but as age came over him, his desire of accumulation degenerated into avarice and the desire of hoarding, which became the ruling passions, and he was approached, even by his confidential officers and those in favour, with more apprehension of robbery and exaction from themselves, than of hope to add to their acquisitions through his indulgence. His temper was in youth excellent, and always under command ; but latterly, the irritability of an impaired constitution frequently overpowered him, and he has been known to break out into fits of passion, and to descend to the use of personal violence towards the objects of his rage ; but there was no ferocity in his disposition, and he never punished a criminal with death, even under circumstances of aggravated offence.

Humanity, indeed, or rather a tenderness for life, in spite of some acts of harshness, was a trait in the character of Runjeet Singh: there is no instance of his having wantonly imbrued his hands in blood. "Never, perhaps," observes Baron Hügel—no partial witness—"was so large an empire founded by one man with so little criminality; and when we consider the country and the uncivilized people with whom he has had to deal, his mild and prudent government must be regarded with feelings of astonishment." Cunning and conciliation were his two great implements of diplomacy, whilst his consummate prudence, his great knowledge of mankind in general, and of Asiatics in particular, his energy and perseverance, enabled him to employ those implements with invincible success. When he is taxed with want of faith, it must be remembered that he was the only eastern prince whom the British Government never could accuse of a breach of his engagements.

His sensual indulgences were, as before remarked, the vices of his country; neither his own uncultivated mind, nor the society of those about him, offered any temptation to more refined gratifications. Hunting, in which he took great delight from his earliest years, was, perhaps, the most innocent of his recreations, and in these excursions, Runjeet realized the gorgeous descriptions given of the hunting expeditions of Asiatic monarchs. He was accompanied, as a soldier-king, by a camp, with elephants, troops, and cannon, and every luxury was provided that could charm the eye, captivate the ear, or pamper the grosser senses. At his court, troops of Cashmerian nautch-girls of the rarest beauty, "very fair, with expressive countenances, and large and lovely eyes,"* were constantly in attendance to enact their voluptuous dances. Amongst other caprices of Runjeet, he formed a band of Amazons, consisting of about 150 of the most beautiful girls of Cashmere, Persia, and the Punjab, who were magnificently dressed, armed with bows and arrows, and frequently appeared on horseback, mounted en cavalier, for the amusement of the Maharaja.

His passion for horses, which amounted almost to insanity, has been already mentioned. He was not singular in this passion, for every Sikh keeps, if he can, a horse and a brood mare. Runjeet was fond of exhibiting his stud, and Mr. Moorcroft, an excellent judge of this animal, speaks of one as beautifully made. The efforts of Runjeet to secure the famous horse Lylee have been recorded.* This animal was seen by Lieut. Barr's party in the beginning of 1839 (when the horse was old), and it disappointed their expectations. It was "a speckled grey, overloaded with fat, filthily dirty, and its heels, for want of paring and exercise, were so high, that it limped along with much difficulty."† A Dakhini, for which the Maharaja had given about 1,000*l.*, in their opinion, far exceeded Lylee in beauty. His horses were continually in Runjeet's thoughts, and almost constantly in his sight, covered (even the dray-horses) with jewels and rich caparisons. He was never weary of talking of them, or of caressing them.

Runjeet took great delight in military parade and display, and spent nearly half of every day in reviews, examining equipments, or in some way studying to promote the efficiency of the different branches of his army.

Upon the subject of religion, it has been reported that Runjeet was indifferent; but this is an error. Although no bigot, and active in restraining the fanaticism of the Akalis and other zealots, he was scrupulous in the performance of all the prescribed ceremonies and observances of the Sikh faith, and for a certain number of hours every day he had the Gran't'h read before him by gurus. He was liberal in alms to Fakirs and men of reputed sanctity, not excluding Bramins, for whom he had a reverence. He was popular on this account with his Hindu subjects, as well as for his severity towards the Mahomedans. He was, indeed, superstitious in the extreme, readily conceiving fancies in respect to his destiny and fortunes, and never failing to consult astrologers before entering upon any important undertaking. The usual mode of divination was by placing between the leaves of the Gran't'h two slips of paper, on one of which was written the object of his wishes, and on the other the reverse; these papers were selected by a guru, without being looked at, and the question was decided by the paper first taken. He was by no means averse to the Christian creed. In 1830, he expressed a desire that an English missionary should call upon him in private, and explain to him the doctrines of our faith, and he was so interested in the subject, that he requested to be furnished with a copy of the Scriptures.* At a later period, he sought an interview with the Rev. Mr. Lourie, whom he consulted upon a project he had formed for establishing a system of education in his dominions, and urged the reverend gentleman to superintend it. The institutionary discipline of a young Khalsa Sikh is very compendious: when he can bend a bow, wield a sabre, and mount a horse, his instruction is completed.

With respect to the policy and internal government of Runjeet Singh, the most remarkable feature is, the entire absence of any thing like system or principle in his management. His career throughout was that of an encroaching usurper, and seizer of all within his reach; but what he so possessed himself of, he subjected to no systematic administration. The whole was committed to farmers, with full power to deal with the lives and properties of the producing classes of the population, Runjeet trusting to his own military means for the control of these farmers, and for the exaction from them of any extra gains he might learn that they had made. Nevertheless, his extortions were directed chiefly against the old Sikh families, and his own state officers: merchants and traders were protected, and the duties and taxes were not for the most part immoderate. He however shewed a disposition to become a dealer in some articles, as in shawls, salt, &c., and all that he touched became of course monopoly, or in some other shape the source of exaction and corrupt gain.

Major Lawrence has given a brief sketch of Runjeet's revenue system (still in existence), which is too characteristic of that ruler not to be accurate. Two-fifths of the produce was the proportion nominally taken by the sirkar (state); at this rate, on an estimate of the average proceeds of a certain term of years, the whole country was farmed out in larger or smaller portions. The estimate might be too much or too little; but the farmer must realize the amount, and his own profits too, without collecting more than two-fifths, or his exactions were sure to reach the sovereign's ear, and a proportionate disallowance was made in his accounts. Should the farmer fail to realize the amount specified by the government, he was punished by imprisonment, or degradation; or forgiven, and allowed another chance elsewhere, with the balance written against his name, according to his interest at court, or the opinion entertained of his ability. Mr. Moorcroft mentions a new principle of rating the annual collections adopted by Mazar Mal, formerly Runjeet's chief financial minister. This was by a rough analysis of the soil. A given quantity of earth was put into a fine muslin sieve and washed with water till all the mould was carried through, and nothing but the sand was left, and according to its proportion to the whole, a deduc-tion was made from the assessment. The general character of the soil of the Punjab, composed of mould and sand, renders this mode of appreciating its assessment more correct than might be supposed.

It cannot be said that Runjeet Singh gave to the Punjab any constitution, or fixed form of government. There is no law, written or oral, and no regular courts of justice have been anywhere established. The civil government and the power of life and death, in the provinces, is in the hands of the sirdars, jagirdars, and renters. The revenue-farmer is judge, magistrate, and often custom-master, within his jurisdiction. The personal character of each individual, therefore, is the standard by which justice is measured: some districts are tolerably administered; some oppressed. The adawlut, or nominal court of justice, is a rich source of revenue, fine being the punishment usually awarded. In civil cases the prisoner is mulcted one-fourth of the amount at issue, and it is common for both parties to endeavour to purchase a decision. Under such a system, the poor man has little chance; the vagabond thief, urged to plunder by necessity, loses his nose or ears (mutilation being the ordinary punishment for crimes); but the wealthy robber and dextrous ruffian are unmolested. From the customs alone a vast sum enters the state treasury; the trader, however, has not only to pay the regulated tolls, but the exactions of the subordinate officers. Every pass and ferry is guarded, and rules and rates are laughed at. Runjeet, whilst he overthrew the old political institutions of the Sikhs, substituted none in their stead. If he had any theory of government, it was a desire to reduce all the people of the Punjab to the same social level. He treated the chiefs of all his subjected states strictly as jagirdars, and obliged all to furnish quotas of troops for his most distant and dangerous expeditions, thus saving the khas troops of the state. The Gurumata, or old council of the Sikhs, has, with every other institution adapted to the state of things which existed before the establishment of his supremacy, been entirely discontinued. The last council of the kind was held when Holkar fled into the Punjab, and the British armies followed in pursuit, and it was a question what part the Sikhs, as a nation, should take in the juncture. Runjeet Singh, though the most influential chief, pretended not then to any supremacy of dominion, and the question was one which, as it concerned the whole body of the Sikhs, required that all should have a voice in determining. At present the government appears to be a pure despotism, the standing army, ever ready for active service, and eager to be employed where plunder and exaction are the objects, forming the whole machinery of administration. By it alone the treasury is filled, and control exercised over state officers, powerful subjects, and, indeed, over every class of the population. The personal influence and verbal orders of the head of the state form again the exclusive hold upon the discipline and affections of the troops. Thus the whole power and authority centres in the single individual placed at the head of affairs.

Runjeet, unfortunately, had not either the opportunity or the inclination to avail himself, in his civil administration, of European intelligence and practical knowledge, from which he derived so much advantage in his military affairs. The only foreigner he employed in a superior civil capacity was Mr. or Dr. Harlan, an American, a man of ability and enterprise, who was placed over the district of Goojrat, but soon lost the favour of his employer.*

The territorial possessions of Runjeet Singh, prior to the treaty with Shah Shuja, comprised the entire fork of the Punjab, as bounded by the Indus and Sutluj, the two extreme rivers. He held besides Cashmere, and the entire hill country to the Snowy range, and even Ladakh beyond the Himalaya; for though many of the rajas of this tract still remained in their possessions, they had been reduced to the character of subjects, paying tribute equal to their utmost means, and contributing men to the armies of Lahore whenever called upon. Besides this extensive territory, Runjeet Singh had about 45 talooks entire, or in share with others, on the British side of the Sutluj; and westward of the Indus, he held Khyrabad, Akona, and Peshawur; Dera-Ghazi-Khan, which was farmed to the Nuwab of Bahawulpoor, and Dera-Ismael-Khan, assigned to Hafiz Ahmed Khan of Munkera, as before related. He also levied tributes from the Balooch chiefs of Tonk and Sagur to the southward.

* Major Lawrence (Adv. in Punjab, vol. i. p. 46), who does justice to the talents and abilities of Dr. Harlan, says he was a man of strong passions, and seems to have taken little pains to restrain them. It appears from a Lahore Ukiabar of 1832, that a complaint was made to Runjeet that Harlan had defrauded him in the settlement of the Goojrat district. He was accordingly summoned to Lahore with his accounts. He was afterwards dismissed, and immediately went to Dost Mahomed Khan, and was not ashamed to boast that he had brought down the Dost upon his former master.

Captain Murray estimated that the amount of land revenue and tributes, annually levied from the whole of these possessions, wasRs. 1,24,03,900

Besides which, the customs of the Punjab yielded 19,00,600

ments, without paying any thing to the Khalsa, territory yielding 1,09,28,000

Thus making the entire resources of the country under the dominion of Runjeet, Rs. 2,58,09,500

This total is not very wide of the revenue set down in the books of the Mogul government as the produce of the Lahore Sooba, and, considering that Cashmere and some territory south of the Sutluj is included, the correspondence of amount is in favour of the correctness of the estimate, for the province cannot be so productive under the Sikhs, as it was in the peaceable times of the Mogul dominion.

By the treaties existing at his death, Runjeet Singh was confirmed in possession of all the territories bounded north and north-east by the portions of the Hindoo Kosh and Tibet mountains lying between the Otmaunkail mountains and the Sutluj ; south-west by the Otmaunkail, Khybur, and Soliman ranges, the latter approaching the Indus in the vicinity of Mittunkote ; and south-east by the river Sutluj from the Tibet mountains to its junction with the Indus ; and by the Indus from Mittunkote to Omerkote. The northern and eastern frontier may be estimated at 170 leagues; the north-west and western at 190 leagues; the south-eastern at 200 leagues; and the area of the territory included within these boundaries, at 14,000 square leagues.

Runjeet Singh had for many years been hoarding treasure, and the fort of Govindgurbh, built by him, and kept always in excellent repair, was the principal place for its deposit. Captain Murray, speaking from the best information he could collect, which, however, was necessarily very imperfect, estimated the value of the property accumulated by Runjeet in cash, jewels, horses, and elephants, to have been not less than ten crores of rupees, or the same number of millions of pounds sterling. By some the estimate is carried much higher, but such computations, being for the most part conjectural, err generally on the side of excess.

The military force of the Lahore state, in 1832, is set down by the same officer, and his authority is the safest to follow on the point, as follows :

The artillery of Runjeet Singh consisted of 376 guns and 370 swivels, mounted on the backs of camels, or on light carriages adapted to their size. For these, there was no corps of artillery regimented and organized, as is the custom in European armies, but there was a darogha, at the head of a large establishment. Several of the corps of cavalry, and all the battalions of infantry, had guns attached to them, the gunners of which were borne on the strength of the respective corps. The jinsee, or heavy train only, is distinct from the rest of the army.

The above accumulation of resources and of force had grown up and been produced entirely by the care and exertions of the Maharaja. His father left him nothing but a body of Sikh cavalry, little superior to that of his neighbours, who have all now been reduced to the condition of subjects. Runjeet Singh, in the formation especially of his military force, evinced the same inquiring activity, the same attention to minutiae and perseverance in watching the execution of his plans, which characterized the first Peter of Russia. The want of a generalizing mind, to refer things to fixed principles, and to lead to the formation or adoption of systems, and a deficiency of the intelligence resulting from education, or from habitual converse with men of high cultivation, have been the main defects of his character, and are the causes of Runjeet Singh's government being based on no solid forms and institutions. But where were such to be found amongst an association of Sikh banditti, formed from the outcasts of society, and from the dregs in particular of the agricultural class, men all in the most desperate circumstances, and driven by want to adopt the life of robbers? All that was educated and refined had disappeared from the Punjab before Runjeet Singh was born. The natural effect, however, of the union of authority in his person has been, to create a court, where, in the course of time, science and refinement might be produced, or collected from the countries around, as the habits of peace and luxury supersede the perpetual activity of war and military expeditions.

And let not those, who are disposed to give to Runjeet Singh the credit due to him as founder of a kingdom and dynasty, take exception at the circumscribed limit of his dominion, as lowering his merit in comparison with others. The circumstances of his position, with the British Government on one side,—fresh risen to a majesty of power, that it would have been madness for him to think of encountering, and with the prejudiced and fanatic Musulman population of Afghanistan upon every other frontier, have been barriers against extension, which it was impossible to overcome, and effectually forbade the hope of carrying the Sikh dominion beyond its present limits. The gain that has already been made upon the latter, and the manner in which the brave and bigoted Mahomedans have, in many instances, been reconciled to the sway of a hated, and even despised sect, are amongst the most creditable features of the policy and career of Runjeet Singh.

Towards the British Government his conduct has been marked with equal sagacity. Careful not to offend to the point leading to actual rupture, he contrived to make his gain of the juncture, at the very moment when the British Government stepped forward to confine his dominion to the Sutluj, and to wrest from his grasp the valuable tract between that river and the Jumna, which was all held by Sikhs, and regarded by him, therefore, as his legitimate and certain prey. When the ill-will and suspicion, engendered by this interference, had subsided, and he felt assured that the interposing government had no desire to push its conquests, or further to interfere with his ambitious views, he cultivated its friendship, and desired to exhibit himself to the world as united to it by close relations.

It is remarkable that Mr. Forster, the traveller, writing in 1783, just after the birth of Runjeet, should have formed so accurate a prognostic of the destiny of the Sikh nation. "We may see," he observes, "some ambitious chief, led on by his genius and success, absorbing the power of his associates, display, from the ruins of their commonwealth, the standard of monarchy."

CHAPTER XX.

A.D. 1839 AND 1840.

It was believed by many persons well acquainted with Indian politics, that an authority so recently formed, and so ill-cemented, as that which had been created by Runjeet Singh, and maintained by his peculiar talents and personal influence, would dissolve into fragments at his death. This expectation was strengthened by the knowledge that his successor was weak, almost imbecile, and utterly incapable of controlling the elements of disorder which the removal of the firm hand of Runjeet would release from confinement. But not only had that powerful hand, in the space of forty years, impressed a shape and form upon the government, which made the parts cohere, but the relations maintained by the late Maharaja with the neighbouring state of British India provided a bulwark which would have enabled a successor of moderate talents to complete what Runjeet had left imperfect, and by directing his attention, no longer required in the field of conquest and aggression, to measures of internal improvement, to establish his authority upon a durable basis.

Fortunately for the Sikhs, the British agents in that quarter hitherto, Captain Ross and Captain Murray, had been men of ability, and at this critical juncture, the British political agent for Sikh affairs was Mr. George Russell Clerk, a gentleman possessing not only talents and energy, but practical good sense, and though of unflinching firmness, gentle, conciliating, and winning in his manners. He was just the person, says a very competent authority,* to manage the rude and boisterous Sikhs: prepared to yield, even to defend, their legitimate claims; to deny, firmly but gracefully, their false pretensions. Always on the alert, not listening to second-hand intelligence, but seeing every thing with his own eyes, he kept the Sikh authorities to their engagements, by shewing that, whilst we respected their just rights, we could enforce a due regard to ours.

The successor of Runjeet Singh possessed another advantage in the able minister who had been appointed to the vizeerat, in fact placed at the head of the government, namely, Raja Dhean Singh, supposing that his views did not reach beyond the station of minister, and aspire to the throne itself.

The Jummoo brothers, Rajas Golab Singh,* Dhean Singh, and Soochet Singh, who have exercised an important influence upon the politics of the Punjab, belonged to a respectable Rajpoot family (of the Dogur tribe), in the Lower Himalaya, which had fallen into obscurity. The three brothers were originally meenas, squires or dependants, of the Raja of Jummoo, and were introduced to the notice of Runjeet in the following manner. Dhean,† who was a private sowar (or lancer), having killed a man in a feud, fled from the vengeance of the victim's friends to the Sikh camp in the plains. Whilst Runjeet Singh was reviewing his troops, he observed, by the side of his elephant, a common lancer breaking-in a vicious horse. The beauty of the young man (then about twenty-five), as well as his skill and bold carriage, struck him, and the replies made to his questions confirmed his good opinion. Runjeet took Dhean into his household, made him first porter to the palace, then deohrewala (lord of the privy chamber, or chamberlain), and ultimately prime minister, in which capacity he amassed enormous wealth, became master of a large mountainous country in Little Tibet, and on the borders of Cashmere, studded with hill forts, maintaining an army of 25,000 men, and a fine artillery. He has been described as a fine-looking man, and though slightly lame, of a noble presence, rather above the usual height of natives, with a quick and intelligent eye, lofty handsome forehead, and aquiline features. Modest and unassuming in his speech and deportment, polite and affable in his manners, he nevertheless cherished a deep and rancorous hatred towards Europeans. He not only acquired Runjeet's confidence, but possessed great influence over the Sikh nation. At the durbar, he stood, or sat upon the ground, behind his master, whilst others, though his inferiors, occupied chairs. He was active, able, and intelligent, and supposed to be an adept in duplicity and dissimulation.

When Dhean had gained a firm footing at the court of Lahore, he introduced his brothers there. Golab, the eldest, had quitted the service of the Raja of Rajaoree and Jummoo, and entered the service of the Raja of Kishtewar. Runjeet was at this time (1819) preparing an expedition against the former, and he gave the command of it to Golab, who was completely successful; he took possession of the country and made the raja prisoner. By artifice and fraud, he made himself master of Kishtewar and of the person of the prince he had lately served, and carried him to Lahore, where he caused him to be poisoned. For these services, Golab was rewarded with the principality of Jummoo, in jagir, where he immediately began to extend his conquests on all sides, between Cashmere and Attock, nominally for the Sikh ruler, but really on his own behalf, and came to be considered, after Runjeet, the greatest lord in the Punjab. The character of this personage has been portrayed in very dark colours, as a cruel tyrant, whose ambition threatened to absorb all the independent rajaships in the hills, and under whose oppressions and extortions the people groaned.* He is accused of massacring his prisoners, and even flaying men alive and stuffing their skins with grass, to be exhibited as examples to others. Major Lawrence states that he is reported to have put to death no fewer than 12,000 persons. He had the management of all the family territories, under a compact with his brothers. He is indefatigable in business, and possesses much information. M. Jacquemont,† who visited him in his hill principality in 1831, described Golab as about forty, very handsome, a lion in courage, but with the plainest, mildest, and most elegant manners. Major Lawrence says, Golab's history would itself fill a volume.*

Soochet, the youngest brother, although he shared the favour of Runjeet, acquired jagirs, and was wealthy and powerful, did not raise himself to the same eminence as his brothers, and was not much trusted.

From the year 1827, these three persons engrossed the entire favour of Runjeet; yet, according to Burnes, Golab was the only one of them who could read, the other two being ignorant of the first rudiments of education. Major Lawrence asserts, that it was by ministering to Runjeet's debaucheries that Dhean first obtained his favour, and he retained it by the basest subserviency.

Khuruk Singh ascended the throne quietly. Some whispers were circulated respecting a design to substitute Heera Singh, the son of Dhean Singh; but this project seems inconsistent with the part acted by Dhean. Some movements were made by the Koonwur Sher Singh, or by his partisans; but, without encouragement from the British Government, he had no prospect of success. A deputation, consisting of Mr. Clerk and Captain Osborne (military secretary to the Governor-General), proceeded to Lahore, in July, 1839, to compliment the new Maharaja on his accession. Sher Singh hastened to make his peace with his brother, and, by the intercession of Raja Dhean Singh, was favourably received.

Meanwhile, the expedition beyond the Indus had realized the utmost expectations of the projectors ; Shah Shuja, by the aid of the British forces, had recovered his two capitals of Candahar and Cabul, with the fortress of Ghuzni ; Dost Mahomed Khan was a prisoner, and the various chiefs of Afghanistan appeared to acquiesce in the Shah's authority. The British detachment, under Colonel Wade, destined to co-operate with the Sikh force at Peshawur, and that of Prince Timur, the son of Shah Shuja, passed the Sutluj, with the ready permission of the Sikh authorities, in February, traversed the Punjab, crossed the Indus at Attock in March, and arrived at Peshawur on the 27th of that month. The allied forces were composed of heterogeneous elements. The British troops (native) did not amount to 400; the Shahzadeh's levy consisted of about 3,500 men, Ghoorkas, Nujeebs (volunteers), Poorbeas (Hindustanis), &c. The Sikh auxiliaries amounted to 6,000, all Musulmans, conformably to the treaty. General Ventura (who had returned from a visit to Europe) was appointed to command this force; he arrived at Peshawur on the 11th April, being followed on the 26th by Prince Nou Nehal Singh. Although it is acknowledged that Runjeet, as far as his health allowed him to attend to public business, endeavoured to fulfil the engagements he had entered into by the treaty, the dislike of the Sikh army, officers and men, to co-operate with the British, was scarcely concealed.* They allowed our troops and Prince Timur's levies to enter the Khybur pass, in July, unassisted—expecting, or hoping, they would be defeated; but were mortified to find they forced that terrific defile, taking the fort of Ali Musjid, whence they reached Jelallabad on the 17th August, and arrived at Cabul, which they found in the occupation of the British army, on the 2nd September. The campaign being over, our auxiliary forces quitted that city in the beginning of October, being followed by the army of the Indus, which on the 1st January, 1840, ceased to exist.

Intelligence of the death of Runjeet reached Peshawur on the 2nd July, in the midst of these operations ; but Prince Nou Nehal Singh remained at that city, from whence he despatched General Ventura to Lahore.

A cordial understanding was not likely to subsist long between a weak, almost idiotic, prince, like Khuruk Singh, surrounded by artful and ambitious men, and the great minister, clothed with all the executive functions of the government, who was intent upon engrossing the whole power of the state. Towards the end of October, 1839, the Maharaja gave great offence to Dhean Singh, by taking into his councils and favour a low-born minion, of handsome person, named Cheyt Singh, bold, forward, and intriguing, who, if he had been content with the command of wealth and patronage, might have secured a longer reign over his feeble master. But Cheyt Singh, without a single qualification for the office, aimed at the post of minister, and the power attained by the Jummoo brothers had provoked, even amongst Runjeet's family, a sufficient number of enemies to render it a matter of little difficulty to raise a party against them.

Amongst the most confidential counsellors of Runjeet, next to the Jummoo brothers and the Fakir Uzeez-ud-deen, were the Bhaes (or brothers) Ram Singh* and Govind Ram, and Misr† Beni Ram. The latter had been Runjeet's treasurer, in which office he was continued by Khuruk Singh, and all three had many relations and connections in various departments of the government. These persons entered into the league formed to destroy the Jummoo Rajas, and they made daily accessions to the conspiracy amongst the army, having, it is said, gained over some of the regiments. The vigilance of Dhean

Singh did not slumber. Aware that Nou Nehal Singh, then a spirited youth of twenty, was the idol of the army, he despatched intelligence of the intrigues to him, at Peshawur, urging the necessity of his presence to protect his own interests. Nou Nehal, though he feared and hated the Jummo family, saw the prudence of availing himself of their influence to overthrow the upstart, Cheyt Singh. On the night of the 8th October, a large body of Golab Singh's hill troops occupied the citadel, with artillery, the matches burning, and surrounded the palace. Before daylight, Prince Nou Nehal Singh, accompanied by the three rajas, Golab, Dhean, and Soochet, their personal adherents and armed men, entered the palace, and penetrated, without causing alarm, towards the sleeping apartments of the Maharaja. In the outer area they were challenged by two orderlies, who were instantly cut down. Finding that the Maharaja and his minion were asleep in an upper room, the party proceeded thither, but were stopped by a company of soldiers, and a soobadar, who refused to let them pass; but the men, observing Prince Nou Nehal

Singh, declared they could not disobey him, and fell into his train. The altercation disturbed Khuruk Singh and his favourite, who concealed themselves in dark corners of adjoining rooms. Cheyt Singh was first discovered, and immediately cut to pieces; shortly after, the Maharaja was found, almost naked, cowering under some furniture. He begged in abject terms for life, and was assured that no violence was meditated against him. He was, however, placed under restraint; the guards were changed, and in the morning it was announced that Cheyt Singh, having been detected in a plot to sell the country to the Feringees (English), had been put to death by the Maharaja's orders. At the Dussera, a few days after, the whole party moved to Amritsur. The only other conspirator who appears to have been punished was Benee Ram, who was thrown into prison, upon the plea that he had refused to shew the heir-apparent the treasury.

From this time Khuruk Singh was not suffered to take any share in the administration of public affairs. He was present at the durbars, clothed with the insignia of royalty, but sat like a statue, and was really kept in strict, though not close, confinement; Nou Nehal Singh being the virtual sovereign. Some authorities say, that Khuruk gradually pined away under the effect of some slow, but subtle poison, which must have been administered by the orders, or with the connivance, of his son.

With the change of rulers, a change of councils took place at the court of Lahore. However hostile might be the feelings of the minister towards the English, he was convinced that sound policy forbade a rupture with the British Government, and therefore he strictly adhered to the obligations contracted with it by the late ruler. Nou Nehal Singh, entertaining the same sentiments regarding the alliance, had not prudence to veil them. An anti-English feeling pervaded all the departments of the administration; emissaries were discovered in various quarters exciting a prejudice against our countrymen; questions were raised upon the treaty respecting the adjustment of boundaries between the Sikh and Cabul dominions in the Peshawur territory and the Derajats; the maintenance of 5,000 Mahomedan troops by the Sikhs at Peshawur and the tolls upon the Indus and Sutluj were likewise matters of dispute, and even whether a passage should be granted to our troops to and from Afghanistan was a question debated with great excitement. Upon one occasion, it is reported, the prince, in open durbar, before all the sirdars, drew his sword, and declared that he was ready to use it for the destruction of the encroaching influence of the English. Meanwhile, it was said that warlike preparations were going on at Lahore; that the arsenals were being filled and cannon made upon a new principle, with percussion-locks.

It demanded all the powers and patience of Mr. Clerk to deal with dispositions so hostile; but at length the counsels of the anti-British party were overruled in the durbar, and all the points in dispute were conceded by the Sikh court.

Dhean Singh was not content with the present state of things. He found that Nou Nehal Singh had all the energy and talents of his grandfather, though with less tact and caution, and that his own influence was decreasing daily. Ram Singh and Govind Ram, with Jemadar Khooshal Singh,* formed the prince's privy council, and not only took the control of public affairs out of the hands of the minister, but treated him with personal disrespect.

Meanwhile, the health of Khuruk Singh continued to decline, and on the 5th November he expired, at the age of thirty-eight. He was not only of weak intellect, but an ill-looking man, in a court remarkable for the number of handsome persons, and his manners were awkward and repulsive.

Upon this occasion, another scene of self-immolation took place. On the day following

* Khooshal Singh was a Hindu, native of Saharupur, in the British territory; he was a man of low birth, and, according to Burnes, cook to a private soldier. Being a fine, handsome young fellow, he won the base favour of Runjeet, who made him one of the hundred picked soldiers appointed to be his night guard. He turned Sikh, and for fifteen years held the command of the door-way, which was a post of influence as well as confidence. He was called jemadar, or lieutenant, as being second only to Runjeet. As a commander, he was harsh and tyrannical. Major Lawrence describes him as, in his time, a coarse, vulgar-looking man.

his death, the body of the deceased Maharaja was burned, and with it the Rani Issur, sister of Sirdar Mungul Singh, and three of her female attendants. No motive, but a slavish obedience to a tyrannical superstition, can be assigned for this act, Khuruk Singh's character being one which could have inspired neither affection nor respect.

The demise of the sovereign, which had been long expected, caused no other sensation than joy, since the event transferred the authority of the state, in all its plenitude, to the hands of a prince, who was popular amongst all classes, especially the military, and whose reign, it was anticipated, would shed an additional lustre upon the Sikh nation. This prospect, however, was disappointed by an occurrence which, if it were not well authenticated, might be supposed to be invented by the dispensers of poetical justice, as a punishment for the unnatural conduct of Prince Nou Nehal Singh towards his father, or be ascribed to the deep and artful contrivance of the Jummoo family. Upon the conclusion of the funeral rites, the new Maharaja and his court, including all the members of the Jummoo family, except Raja Golab Singh, were proceeding to the Ravi to bathe, when, in passing through one of the covered gateways of the city, the crush of elephants shook the structure, and caused one of the beams, of immense weight, to fall; it struck Nou Nehal Singh on the head, and Oodum Singh, son of Golab Singh (who was on the prince's elephant), on the loins. The latter died immediately; the prince lingered in an insensible state till night, when he expired.

Nou Nehal,* who was the only son of Khuruk Singh, did not yet number twenty years.† He was a young man of very promising talents, brave, high-spirited, active, with great firmness of character, and many of the better qualities of his grandfather, but rash and self-willed. In his moral habits he was an example to that corrupt court, being sober and comparatively temperate amidst the scenes of debauchery which surrounded him. His person and manners were

* This name signifies 'new stem,' or 'stock.'

During these transactions the Sikh arms were not idle. A strong force was sent by order of Nou Nehal Singh (in opposition to the advice of the minister) against the hill state of Mundi, in the Alpine Punjab, under the command of General Ventura and Lena Singh, Majethia. The raja of this state was a tributary of Lahore, and paid six lakhs of rupees to the Sikh treasury. The tribute being in arrear, the army was sent nominally to enforce its payment, but really to seize the territory. The raja discharged a portion of the debt, and gave security for the payment of the remainder, promising future punctuality; nevertheless, General Ventura took possession of the whole country, and of the raja's person, employing, for the latter object, a species of stratagem, so often resorted to by Runjeet Singh as to become a part of his policy. When the raja supposed that every thing was settled, he was invited to visit the general, in order to receive a khelat, or dress of honour, and upon his arrival, the tent was surrounded by a regiment of infantry, and the person of the raja secured. The success of this expedition enabled the general to extend the Sikh authority over other hill states in Kulu, Sukyt, and as far as the mountains which skirt the western course of the Sutluj. The events at Lahore, however, put a stop to these conquests. General Ventura was received with all the respect due to a conqueror, bringing the trophies of 200 forts, belonging to various hill chiefs, on his arrival at the capital, in December, 1840.

Towards the north and west, Raja Golab Singh had been for some years pushing his usurpations as far as the valley of Cashmere, and even beyond it. He had seized upon Little Tibet, invaded Ladakh, and taken Leh, the capital, placing upon the gudi a minion of his own. The capture of Little Tibet and of its sovereign is said to have been accomplished in the same treacherous manner as that which was so successful at Mundi. Zorawur Singh, one of the generals of Golab, invited Ahmed Shah, the raja (or gylfo), to visit him, when he was seized and put in chains. This Sikh general, who had gained a victory over the rightful raja of Little Tibet, in 1835, at Syru, near Zanskar, continued his conquests up to the very confines of the Chinese empire, which roused the jealousy of its very jealous authorities, and a severe conflict took place between the Sikh and Chinese forces, in which Zorawur Singh fell : but this event belongs to a later period of Sikh history.

CHAPTER XXI.

A.D. 1840 TO 1842.

THE event which had created a vacancy of the throne was so sudden and unforeseen, that all parties were unprepared, and the succession did not so clearly belong, by right of primogeniture, to the next son of Runjeet, as to preclude all other claims. The circumstances of his birth* threw a doubt upon the legitimacy of Sher Singh, who had never been distinctly acknowledged by his reputed father, and was spoken of as the son of a thoka, or carpenter. The qualities of his character did not unfit him to wield the Sikh sceptre, and Dhean Singh, the minister, whose will inclined the balance, determined to embrace his interests. He accordingly concealed the death of Nou Nehal Singh, giving out that his injury was slight, and excluding all but his partisans from access to the prince whilst he lived. In the meanwhile, he despatched messengers to his brother Golab, and to Sher Singh, who was then at his district of Butala, about seventy miles from Lahore, urging him to lose no time in coming to the capital. Upon the arrival of Sher Singh, the death of Nou Nehal was announced; the sirdars were convened, and it was resolved that Sher Singh should be placed at the head of the government, as regent, it being suggested that the widow of the late Maharaja was pregnant. He was accordingly proclaimed sovereign of the Punjab on the 7th November.

During the few days occupied in the funeral ceremonies of the late Maharaja (in which his two wives, in the bloom of youth and beauty, were burnt with the corpse), when Sikh etiquette requires an entire abstinence from public business, a formidable opposition to the pretensions of Sher Singh was matured. Chund Kowr, the mother of Nou Nehal Singh, availed herself of the rule of succession recognized by the Manjee Sikhs,* whereby a widow has, in default of male offspring, a title prior to that of a brother, and claimed the throne in her own right. She was the first wife of Khuruk Singh, and at this time about forty-four years of age; her person was still pleasing, although rather corpulent. Being a woman of much energy, and little principle or compunction, as well as of dissolute manners, she took advantage of the period of twelve days' suspension of business to form a strong party, of which Ajeet Singh, Sindawala, her paramour, was the head. Before that period had expired, Uttur Singh, the head of the Sindawala family, the nearest to the throne after the direct descendants of Runjeet, arrived at Lahore, as well as Golab Singh, who, for some mysterious reason, took a different side from his brother Dhean. Even Dhean's son, Heera Singh, the favourite minion of Runjeet, and who performed so conspicuous a part in the drama afterwards enacted at this court, chose the cause of Chund

* Vol. i. p. 147.

Kowr, which was also embraced by the army. Dhean Singh now relinquished the attempt to maintain Sher Singh upon the throne, and the latter resigned his pretensions, being the first to present his nuzzur, of 101 pieces of gold coin, to Chund Kowr, who, with the consent of the sirdars, was on the 30th November proclaimed Rani.

The conduct of the Jummoo brothers in this affair is difficult of explanation. Most authorities agree in attributing the different parts taken by them,—Dhean and Soochet linking themselves apparently with the interest of Sher Singh, and Golab and Heera with the Rani,—to some deep-laid scheme of subtle policy. It may, perhaps, be traced to a motive which, in troubled times, impelled different members of one family in England to join opposite political parties, namely, a desire to preserve the family estates.

Had the Rani been a woman of prudence and decency, and had her council been men of ability and principle, she might have retained her position at the head of the government, in spite of the repugnance of a martial people like the Sikhs to be ruled by a woman.* But she regarded the supreme authority as a means of indulging her passions and vices; the licentiousness which was tolerated in Runjeet Singh was scandalous, even at Lahore, in a female; and, moreover, she forgot how much she owed to the army (which had, perhaps, placed her upon the throne), having not only omitted to distribute gifts amongst them, but curtailed their privileges. She did not appear in public, and her council consisted of men who were not popular. Khooshal Singh was hated by the troops; Ram Singh and Govind Ram were unacquainted with military matters, and these were her chief advisers, in addition to Golab Singh, whose sincerity and fidelity were equivocal. The Rani and her advisers were opposed to the restoration of Raja Dhean Singh to his former authority, though he still held the post of prime minister, and it was ordered by the council that henceforward all decrees were to be signed with the Rani's own hand.

Discontent soon spread throughout the country; insurrections broke out in various parts, and the army at Lahore began to manifest that spirit of turbulence which led subsequently to such fearful consequences. Sher Singh was not an inattentive spectator of a state of things which portended a revolution. With a view of averting this calamity, or to secure the throne upon any terms, he proposed to marry Chund Kowr, his brother's widow, according to the Sikh rite of Kurawa, or Chadur-dula.^{*} The Rani, though she had no design thus to part with power, affected to receive the proposal favourably, and invited Sher Singh to an interview, treacherously making arrangements to waylay and murder him. This plot was disclosed (it is said by Dhean Singh) to Sher Singh, who retired to Butala.

The majority of the sirdars now became convinced that the welfare of the nation required the removal of the Rani, and the restoration of Sher Singh to the throne.

Dhean Singh and his brother Soochet, on pretence of a hunting-party in the hills, left Lahore, and in an interview with Sher Singh, advised him to march to the capital, declaring that the troops there were ready to join him, and that General Ventura would afford his aid. This declaration was confirmed by the arrival of secret agents from the army, pledging the troops to support his claims, on condition that he gave them a certain amount of donatives, which was specified in a written agreement.

The day of the Bussunt festival (10th January), when the Sikh troops at Lahore would be paraded, was fixed upon as that of the proclamation of Sher Singh, who set out from Butala, with about 500 men, on the 8th January, and marching with expedition, arrived with his little band before Lahore on the 10th. Rumours of an intended outbreak had reached the ears of the Rani's party, and Golab Singh occupied the Summun-boorj, or citadel of Lahore, with his personal troops, about 3,000 men, placing the city gates in charge of Sikhs who were sworn to be faithful to the Rani. Money and liberal promises were dispensed to the troops and even the people. Upon the arrival of Sher Singh in the vicinity of Lahore, General Ventura immediately went to him,* with 6,000 men and twenty-one pieces of artillery. Nearly at the same moment, Dhean Singh galloped up, having preceded a body of 15,000 hill-men, whom he was leading from his estates.

The rani had shut herself up in the Hazaree Bagh, or palace, with Uttur Singh, Ajeet Singh, Lena Singh, and others of her party; but they had no confidence. The troops in the city were not to be depended upon, and part of Golab's hill troops were occupied in watching the Sikh garrison. However, the gates of the city were closed, and the walls mounted with cannon, which repeatedly fired at the assailants; but in the night of the 14th, the latter gained an entrance into the city, where Sher Singh was welcomed with acclamations.

The citadel was defended with great obstinacy. An assault, after the gate and part of the wall had been breached, by a storming party of Akalis and others, headed by Jowala Singh, was repulsed, and the party almost destroyed. The conflict raged till the evening of the 17th January, the assailants suffering more than the garrison, being completely without shelter. The loss of the besiegers, it is said, amounted to 2,000 men. The exasperated soldiers vowed revenge against Golab's party; at length Dhean Singh and Soochet Singh, having procured a promise of pardon for Golab Singh and Heera Singh, by the intervention of General Ventura, a parley was entered into, and the citadel surrendered; but it required great efforts, and all the influence of General Ventura, to prevent the massacre of the brave garrison, which marched out secretly at night, a Sikh priest being sent as a hostage for their safety.

The Sikh soldiers, baulked of their revenge upon the garrison of the citadel, seem to have wreaked their fury upon the city. The enormities of which they were guilty, it is said, almost baffle belief. Property was plundered and wantonly destroyed; merchants and shopkeepers were tortured; under the pretext of seeking for obnoxious commanders and moonshees, every species of violence and cruelty was perpetrated. "Had the city been taken by storm, it would not, probably, have suffered more."* General Court, who, like M. Ventura, however favourable he might have been to the cause of Sher Singh, scorned to violate his oath, was an object of peculiar hatred to the Sikh troops; his house was pillaged, and he was obliged, in order to save his life, to seek refuge in the British territory, whither he was followed by the Sindawala sirdar, Uttur Singh. Khooshal Singh was generously protected by Sher Singh at the risk of his own life; others escaped by being carried out of the city in tubs and baskets. Golab Singh and Heera Singh retired with their troops to the right bank of the Ravi.

Meanwhile, Chund Kowr, though a prisoner, experienced no other violence; she was allowed to occupy apartments in the fort, with Tek Chund, her treasurer, and, as reported, one of her paramours, and an ample allowance was made to her. Previous to the fall of the citadel, she had despatched Ajeet Singh to Mr. Clerk, then at Umbala (towards whom, upon her accession, she held very high language), and afterwards to Mr. Metcalfe, the resident at Delhi, proposing to make over six annas in the rupee of the revenues of the Punjab (namely, one-half) to the British Government, if it would support her with its troops against Sher Singh, whom she described as the son of a low man, then living at Aminabad. Ajeet afterwards proceeded to Calcutta, but he was refused an audience by Lord Auckland. It is scarcely necessary to say that the proposition with which he was charged was never for a moment entertained. In fact, upon the death of Nou Nehal, Mr. Clerk had sent a message of congratulation to Sher Singh.

The deposed Rani remained in this state of restraint for more than a year, treated with outward respect, but closely watched; during this time the Sindawala sirdars in the British territory, in conjunction with the Rani's partisans at Lahore, carried on intrigues for her restoration, secretly levying troops, even corrupting some of the Khalsa regiments, and it is not improbable that, had she lived much longer, a counter-revolution would have been essayed. But her life was brought to a sudden close in a mysterious manner. Whilst Sher Singh was absent from Lahore, the ex-Rani was one morning, in June, 1842, found in her apartment with her skull fractured, occasioned, it was discovered, by four of her slave-girls having beaten her with their slippers,—an instrument of severe correction commonly employed in India,—in which state she lingered for three days, and then expired. The punishment of the criminals, who lost their hands, ears, and noses, and were exiled beyond the Ravi, did not extinguish the suspicion that the deed was done in obedience to orders, as an easy mode of removing a dangerous person whose life could not be openly taken.*

Sher Singh was again proclaimed on the

* According to a Lahore Ukhbar of September 6, 1843, Sher Singh incautiously acknowledged that he was the author of the Rani's death. Having been informed, shortly before his own assassination, that Ajeet Singh was conspiring against him, he declared that, if he found this to be true, he would put him to death, "as he had done with Chund Kowr."

27th January, 1841. The services rendered, and the risks encountered, by Raja Dhean, made his restoration to office almost a debt of justice, and from that moment he became the virtual ruler of the state. It is said that Sher Singh manifested his deference towards Dhean Singh so far as not only to make no order in the slightest matter without his approbation, but to rise and fold his hands,—a mark of respect from an inferior to a superior,—in the presence of his minister. His brother Golab, and his son Heera, were invited to court; the latter was soon after appointed commander-in-chief of the army, whilst all offices at court and in the provinces were filled with Dhean's creatures, so that the power and influence of the Jummoo family were now almost unlimited. The chiefs of the Zenana party, the enemies of this family, were punished by the sequestration of their jagirs; that of Khooshal Singh, being contiguous to Dhean's, was, of course, added to the minister's overgrown possessions, and the jagirs of the Sindawala sirdars were confiscated to the Khalsa. Every attempt made to divide the favour of the Maharaja with the minister brought punishment, if not ruin, upon the aspirant. Some were sent on distant employments, others were banished, and Jowala Singh, who had headed the storming party at the Summun-boorj, and was a personal friend of Sher Singh, endeavouring to make head against the minister's monopoly of influence, was thrown into prison upon a charge of treason, and starved to death.

But whilst the minister was thus intrenching his authority, and the Maharaja, a good-natured sensualist, was solacing himself with an unrestrained indulgence in every species of intemperance, a spirit was growing up in the army, which, like the demon in Eastern fiction, threatened to devour the magician who had raised it. The troops in the provinces,—at Peshawur, Multan, Cashmere, and Mundi,—imitated the licentious example of those at the capital, and the year 1841 is described as a year of terror throughout the Punjab. The manner in which these eruptions of turbulence and rapacity were met at those places is characteristic of the various individuals who had to deal with them. General Avitabili, at Peshawur, when the mutinous battalions demanded the gratuities which had been given to their fellows at Lahore, paid them all they demanded, and discharged them, giving secret information to the neighbouring peasantry—Mahomedans in faith and robbers by profession—that the retiring soldiers were rebels, who had plenty of money. The hint was acted upon; the Sikhs were attacked by the Afghans, and though they made a vigorous resistance, were glad to disgorge their extortions, and return to the service. At Multan, Dewan Sawun Mull, the able governor of that province, in like manner, complied with all the demands of his rebellious troops, and allowed them to depart to their homes, despatching, at the same time, bodies of trusty soldiers, who took from the Sikhs (travelling in small parties) the money they had received. At Cashmere, the governor, Mean Singh, a man of great firmness, refused to comply with the impudent demands of his Sikh soldiers, upon which they murdered him in open durbar, an act which brought upon them speedy and appropriate punishment. Golab Singh, being in the neighbourhood, promptly moved upon Cashmere; the mutineers made a desperate resistance, and were destroyed almost to a man. At Mundi, the mutineers seem to have been uncontrolled, the general, Ventura, being absent, and several Europeans suffered. Mr. Foulkes, an English adventurer, a young man of much promise, a colonel in the Sikh service, was attacked in his tent, cut down, and cast, while yet alive, upon a burning pile.* A French officer, Colonel Mouton, was saved by the heroism of his wife, who threw herself between him and his assassins, and called upon them to kill her, a sight which touched the feelings of even those savages, and diverted them from the crime. In this state of things, General Ventura, and all the European officers who could leave the service, retired from the Punjab.

* Colonel Foulkes is well spoken of by Mr. Vigne (Travels in Kashmir, vol. i. p. 130) and Lieut. Barr (Journal, p. 75). The former states that he distinguished himself at the siege of a virgin fortress, called Ambeta, taken from the Mundi raja by General Ventura. The troops under his command being in a state of mutiny, he was advised not to interfere, but to depart. He refused, however, with proper spirit, to leave his post. In the night he was awakened by the cries of his orderly, who called to him to fly; but the soldiers rushed into the tent, cut him down, and a pile being heaped up and set fire to, he was cast upon it and burnt before life was extinct. Some of these miscreants were punished at the instigation of Mr. Clerk.

The disorganized condition of the army produced a corresponding effect upon the internal state of the country. Bands of robbers roamed about; old feuds revived; boundary disputes were decided by the sword; assassination stalked in the open day, and every vestige, even of the imperfect system of law which had hitherto preserved order and tranquillity, was rapidly disappearing.

The abilities and energies of Dhean Singh, great as they were, could not subdue these manifold evils. The most urgent was the condition of the army, and he endeavoured to rid himself of the more turbulent of the troops by discharging them with gratuities, and replacing them by hill-men. But whilst these raw levies deteriorated the character of the army, the discharged soldiers augmented the plundering bands which desolated the provinces. Some of the disbanded troops crossed the Sutluj, and occasioned great disorders in the British territory.

The minister, moreover, was not altogether without opposition at the durbar, where a party still maintained its ground, consisting of men who, though bitter enemies of the Jummoo family, were too cautious and prudent to come in open collision with its power. The heads of this party were Futteh Singh Man, an old, brave sirdar; Sham Singh, Atarewala; and Lena Singh, Majethia. The influence of their advice upon the mind of the Maharaja was sometimes visible to the minister, who, in order to remove it, would leave Lahore, apparently in disgust, and go to hunt, or pay a visit to his hill estates; he soon found that his absence was intolerable, and that he was soothed, and courted back to manage the difficult functions of the government, and keep in subjection the unruly soldiery, who would surround the palace, and even offer direct affronts to the Maharaja himself.

During this eventful year, various events occurred of minor importance. In July, 1841, the widow of Nou Nehal Singh was delivered of a still-born son, which relieved Sher Singh from one source of apprehension. In the month of April, the Maharaja had a narrow escape from drowning. Having embarked on the Ravi, upon an excursion of pleasure, with Dhean Singh, and other persons of rank, the boat, being overladen, went down in deep water. The elephants, which attended the party on the banks, were driven into the water, and all the persons were saved except Umur Singh, Aloowala. In the previous month, Tek Chund, the treasurer of the Rani, Kowr Chund, was murdered in her apartment, the lady being wounded in the vain endeavour to preserve the life of her favourite. The object of the assassins being to force Tek Chund to reveal the place where certain treasure was supposed to be concealed, it must be presumed that they were authorized by persons in authority.

At the close of the year, the calamitous outbreak at Cabul occurred, taking every one by surprise, fulfilling, however, the sagacious prognostications of Runjeet Singh. The critical situation in which our troops in that country were placed, and the difficulty of relieving them, rendered the friendly co-operation of the Sikh Government a matter of vast importance. It must be allowed that, as far as the government itself was concerned, there was little reason to complain, though its orders, being intrusted to unwilling agents, were inefficiently executed.

No sooner was the intelligence received at Lahore, than the strongest assurances were given to Mr. Clerk, that all the obligations contracted by the Sikh Government, under the tripartite treaty, should be punctually fulfilled. In conformity with this engagement, strong reinforcements were sent off to Peshawur, under the command of Raja Golab Singh, who was accompanied by Pertab Singh, the Maharaja's son. Disaffection and insubordination had, however, spread throughout the army, and impaired the authority of its commanders. Brigadier Wild, who was ordered to enter the Khyber Pass in the beginning of 1842, and occupy the fort of Ali Musjid, had no guns, and sought the loan of a few, with some troops, from General Avitabili, at Peshawur, who acknowledged that he had received orders from the Maharaja to co-operate with the British forces. But he confessed, at the same time, that his men were so mutinous that they would not obey his orders. "The Sikh soldiers," Brigadier Wild wrote, on the 8th January, 1842, "are in a disorganized and insubordinate state; the men, as well as their chiefs, are decidedly averse to contribute in any way to the success of our arms. General Avitabili told me that he ordered, to-day, two battalions, which it was intended should co-operate with us, to move out to Jumrood, from their lines at Peshawur, and they flatly refused, giving him to understand that they intended to return to Lahore. In the next place, he also ordered three guns to be taken to Jumrood; but as these were in progress, the soldiers seized on one of them, and let only the other two proceed."* The commandants of the corps alleged that they had received secret instructions not to move. Captain Mackeson had a conference with the commandants, and at length prevailed upon them to promise to co-operate with Brigadier

* Papers relating to Mil. Operations in Afghanistan, 1843, p. 93.

Wild in entering the pass and occupying Ali Musjid; and four Sikh battalions, with artillery, were appointed to advance with him. Within a few hours of the time fixed for the operations, the Sikhs abandoned the Brigadier, who, in the attempt to force the defile as far as Ali Musjid, was repulsed by the Khyburis and Afreedis, and forced to retreat to Jumrood with a heavy loss.

The negotiations with the Lahore durbar respecting these matters were placed by the Indian Government, with almost discretionary powers, in the hands of Mr. Clerk, whose personal influence with the durbar, the Sikh chiefs, and even the population, was great, and who was enabled to establish an intimate intercourse directly with the Maharaja and the minister; by his means every effort was employed to overcome the obstacles to a hearty co-operation with our forces on the part of the Sikh troops. Mr. Clerk wrote from Amritsur, on the 6th March, 1842, that he had held a conference with the Maharaja upon this subject; that the durbar had urged the necessity of caution in advancing, and that, when General Pollock had been reinforced by General McCaskill's brigade, Golab Singh had been ordered to co-operate ; and it does not appear in any case that there was backwardness on the part of the Sikh commanders. "The chiefs," observes General Pollock, "are, as far as I have observed, courteous, and perhaps well-disposed towards us ; but the bearing of the soldiery, one and all, is insolent, and they scruple not to express their wish that we may meet with reverses : they are a disorganized rabble."*

Upon the occasion of the advance of General Pollock's army into the Khybur, the Sikhs (a portion of Golab Singh's army) redeemed their character, by forcing the Jubhagi entrance, with a loss equal to that of the British troops. An agreement was made with Golab Singh that he should hold the pass as far as Ali Musjid.

The most friendly intercourse continued to be maintained by Mr. Clerk with the Lahore durbar, and in June, 1842, the Maharaja proceeded in person to the westward, to lend the weight of his own presence and influence to the endeavours made for restoring order and discipline in the Sikh army at Peshawur.

Several reasons are assigned by Mr. Clerk, which should moderate our indignation at the conduct of the Sikh army. A very strong impression seems to have prevailed amongst them, and even their commanders, that we had taken possession of Cabulistan on our own account, and intended to occupy Peshawur, which was a dependency of the Durani empire; and with reference to their refusal to provide carriage-cattle to the British commissariat (of which General Pollock heavily complained), Mr. Clerk ascribed it to "a religious and an invincible repugnance to consign their bullocks to a kine-killing army." So far from the British Government meditating acquisitions of Sikh territory, Lord Ellenborough authorized Mr. Clerk to inform the Lahore Government, that if it should be desirous of adding to its dominion the territory lying between the right bank of the Indus, the Sufeed Koh, and the Himalaya, the British Government would not object to that object being effected, and would facilitate it by placing Jelalabad (which the Maharaja desired to possess) in the hands of the Sikhs.* The latter proposal was accepted by the Lahore durbar, and General Pollock was accordingly directed, upon his retirement from Cabul, to give up Jelalabad to the Sikh troops in its existing state.

In June, 1842, a Sikh force, of 5,000 men, advanced through the Khybur Pass, and took up a position near Jelalabad; a circumstance which, considering the state of the troops, was viewed by our commanders with some uneasiness. Moreover, the feverish state of the Lahore durbar, in the month of August, excited apprehensions in the mind of Lord Ellenborough, who determined to assemble an army of reserve, which, whilst it would facilitate the operations of our armies in Cabul, would “strengthen the existing government of Lahore.” The Governor-General referred, at the same time, to the recent murder of Chund Kowr, the evident suspicions of Raja Golab Singh, the jealousies and uneasiness of the Maharaja, “and his occasional indiscretion in making known his feelings, together with the conversations in the durbar,* which exhibit generally, on the part of the chiefs, doubts of the continuance of our power, and suspicions of our intentions, if we should retain it.”†

From the reports of these conversations, which appeared in the Lahore Ukhbars at this time, it is manifest that Sher Singh evinced much impatience, if not disgust, at the turmoils of his court, and at the state of subjection in which he was retained by the Jummoo family, and some hasty expressions fell from him, which denoted that, in his opinion, ease, security, and personal freedom would not have been purchased too dearly by a transfer of his sovereignty to the British Government. It would seem that Dhean Singh apprehended such a step, and to prevent it, redoubled his vigilance, watching all the motions of the Maharaja, who was virtually a captive. Either the minister, or his son Heera Singh, or one of their confederates, was in proximity to him day and night. Whether at the durbar, or in his private apartments, reviewing his troops or hunting, the prince was never unattended by one of these spies upon his motions, whose respectful demeanour gave him no ostensible ground of complaint.

The Governor-General of British India (Lord Ellenborough) having removed from Calcutta towards the Sutluj, in order to be near the scene of operations whilst our troops were retiring from Afghanistan, a communication was made from his lordship to the Lahore durbar by Mr. Clerk, on the 7th September, expressing a desire to meet the Maharaja, "to discuss some weighty political matters." This proposal was altogether inconsistent with the views of the minister, and accordingly it was at first declined for the present, upon the ground that, as the Sikh troops were absent on foreign service, the Maharaja could not appear properly attended. The point, however, was urged by the Governor-General, and at a special durbar on the 9th December, Mr. Clerk had an interview with Sher Singh, which lasted an hour and a half. After his departure, the question was discussed, when, though the sirdars were averse to it, the Maharaja declared himself in favour of the interview, and a letter was accordingly sent to Mr. Clerk, stating that his highness was ready to conform to the wishes of the Governor-General. Dhean Singh endeavoured to alarm the prince's fears, observing that the English had 60,000 men then assembled at Ferozepore (including the troops returned from beyond the Indus), and "it did not become his highness to pay a visit to the Governor-General in a foreign country, surrounded by such a force." Sher Singh seems to have been at first struck with this suggestion. He had, however, gone too far to recede, and a deputation was sent to Ferozepore, where Lord Ellenborough was then residing, and soon after Raja Dhean Singh was directed to accompany Pertab Singh (the son of the Maharaja), with 5,000 men, to carry the compliments of Sher Singh to his lordship. This mission was received with much honour, and a return mission, with Mr. Secretary (now Sir T.) Maddock at the head, proceeded to Lahore, where it arrived on the 6th January, 1843.

The reception of this mission was in every respect most friendly. Mr. Maddock, with a numerous suite,* was introduced the next day to the Maharaja, at a full durbar. They were conducted into the palace-garden, the paths being spread with shawl-carpets, lined on either side by the body-guard, in splendid dresses. Passing through these, they were conducted to a platform, forty feet long by twenty broad, entirely covered with shawl-carpets, sumeenas, or canopies, supported by silver poles, being stretched over it. Here the durbar was held. Mr. Maddock was received, on alighting from his elephant, by Pertab Singh, then a fine boy, ten years of age, and on ascending the flight of steps, he was met by the Maharaja, and the persons composing the party (twenty-seven in number), after being introduced, were conducted to chairs, which extended in a row from the right of the Maharaja, who seated himself in a gold chair. With the exception of some of the principal persons of the court, most of the sirdars and ministers squatted down on his left hand. At this preliminary durbar, nothing but introductions took place. The following day, another durbar was held, at which the presents were exhibited. On the 9th they were entertained by the Maharaja in the palace. Entering the Summunboorj, they were received by Sher Singh, who, after they had sat for a few minutes, took Mr. Maddock's hand, and conducted him and the party into an open court, illuminated on all sides. In the centre was a tank of water, on the surface of which floated a golden peacock, made of coloured lamps, and various water-fowls, whilst a fountain played at each corner. On one side of the square was a promenade; on another, were shawl canopies on silver poles, beneath which carpets were spread and chairs arranged; on a third side was the Shish Mahal, or Hall of Mirrors, being entirely lined, ceiling and walls, with looking-glasses. Between the reservoir and the Hall of Mirrors, tables were arranged, with viands and liquors, including excellent champagne, sherry, and other European wines. Whilst these liquors were passing round, and the nautch-girls were dancing, the Maharaja ordered his stud of fat, richly-caparisoned horses, as well as his jewels, to be exhibited to his visitors, and he unclasped from his arm the celebrated koh-i-noor, which had been rescued from Jugernat. On the following day the Maharaja reviewed, in company with Mr. Maddock, the troops at the capital, amounting to 60,000 men, the line extending to between eight and nine miles.

The projected interview between the Maharaja and the Governor-General did not take place; upon the close of this year a sanguinary revolution changed the whole face of affairs at the court of Lahore.

Before entering upon this painful narrative, it may be proper to notice some incidents in Sikh history less important, but not without interest.

In January, 1843, Dost Mahomed Khan, released from his confinement by the untoward events in Afghanistan, in his progress towards Cabul through the Punjab, could do no less than pay a visit to the Maharaja at Lahore. Had his choice been perfectly free, he would probably have avoided an interview which, for many reasons, must have been mortifying. Despoiled of all the attributes of rank and dignity, indebted to the clemency of his conquerors for his liberation, he presented himself before the chiefs of a nation which hated him and was hated by him, and had been a party to his humiliation. But the Ameer experienced generous treatment at the hands of Sher Singh, who received him on the 21st January, in full durbar, with all the honour due to a royal visitor. Dost Mahomed Khan remained at the court for more than a month, during which time much negotiation was observed between him and the Sikh ministers, and some treaty or compact was executed by the Ameer, the effect of which did not transpire, beyond a statement in one of the Ukhbars, that the latter had consented to pay tribute to Lahore for some territory to be ceded to him. In May, Mr. Clerk visited Lahore, to be present at the marriage ceremony of Prince Pertab Singh, the eldest son of the Maharaja, and heir-apparent. At the same time, General Avitabili resigned the governorship of Peshawur, in consequence of his health, and came to Lahore to obtain leave to visit Europe. The government of Peshawur, civil and military, was committed to Tej Singh.

The Maharaja, about this time, paid a visit to the estates of Golab Singh at Jum-moo, in connection with which some incidents had recently happened, but the narrative requires to be taken up from an earlier period.

Reference has already been made to the military operations and conquests of the Sikhs in Tibet, which appear to have been carried on upon a larger scale than was supposed at the period when they took place.

Tibet is commonly distributed into three great provinces, namely, Upper Tibet, or Bootan; Middle Tibet, or Ladakh; and Little Tibet, or Bulti. Middle Tibet, which immediately adjoins the territory of Cashmere, in the reign of Aurungzeb, was invaded by the Kalmaks, and the ruler of the country, unable to repel them, applied for aid to the Mogul governor of Cashmere, who granted it on condition that Ladakh became tributary to the Mogul empire. From that period, until the reign of Mahomed Shah, Ladakh paid, through Cashmere, a small annual tribute to the court of Delhi. On the invasion of Hindustan by Ahmed Shah Abdali, the tribute was transferred to the Durani government of Cabul, and was paid to their officers in Cashmere, until that province was invaded and subdued by the Sikhs. Runjeet Singh intimated his intention to enforce his claim upon Ladakh, as lord of Cashmere, and the raja (or khalun) was advised to ward off this claim, which he knew would eventually lead to the appropriation of the whole territory, by tendering his allegiance to the government of British India, as the legitimate representative of the dynasty of Timur. This step was delayed till the reception of a message from the court of Lahore, through the governor of Cashmere, inquiring why the tribute had not been paid as usual, and threatening a forcible levy, if it was not speedily despatched. At this critical juncture (1821), the late Mr. Moorcroft happened to be at Leh, the capital of the state of Ladakh, and the khalun requested him to be the medium of forwarding his tender of allegiance to the British Government, as his paramount sovereign. Mr. Moorcroft consented to do so, apprizing the Sikh ruler, at the same time, by letter, of what he had done, expostulating likewise with that chief on his unjustifiable demand of tribute. Mr. Moorcroft conceived that his motives justified this interposition, though he was clothed with no official character: on the one hand, he averted from an amiable and harmless people the oppressive weight of Sikh exaction and insolence; on the other, he secured for his country an influence over a state which, lying on the British frontier, offered a central mart for the extension of her commerce to Turkistan and China, and a strong outwork against an enemy from the north. His conduct was, however, wholly disapproved of, and he was severely censured by the Supreme Government at Calcutta, for taking unauthorizedly a part in political arrangements. The allegiance of Ladakh was declined, and Runjeet Singh was informed that Mr. Moorcroft had acted without the sanction of the British Government; consequently, the khalun of

Runjeet, however, was not in a condition or humour to take advantage of his opportunity in this quarter, until the Jummoo raja, Golab Singh, had extended his authority in the hills, and acquired by his severities a reputation which became the terror of the country, and he was then authorized to enforce the demands of the Sikh court upon Ladakh. Golab placed an army under the command of Zorawur Singh, who gradually subjected the whole province, and, defeating the khalun in 1835, deposed him from his authority, and vested it in a person appointed by Golab Singh. Ladakh is now little better than a Sikh province, the Ladakhis being treated by their conquerors with insolence and cruelty.*

* Moorcroft's Travels, vol. i. p. 420. Professor Wilson, in the preface to his edition of Mr. Moorcroft's Travels, observes: "The fear of giving offence to Runjeet Singh, no doubt, induced the Government to reprove Mr. Moorcroft, and to decline the proffered allegiance of Ladakh; but it is much to be regretted that any such needless apprehension should have persuaded them to relinquish so justifiable an opportunity of extending British influence. Runjeet had not the shadow of a right to claim Ladakh as his own. It was an independent principality, at liberty to seek protection where it chose, and the buckler of the British power might have been warrantably thrown over it, without injury to its own independence, or to the rights of its neighbours."

The occupation of Ladakh was only a step to further encroachments. When Sher Singh was governor of Cashmere, he endeavoured to make himself master of Little Tibet, which likewise adjoins the valley to the north. He advanced towards Iskardo, the capital, as far as Godyh, where a rapid torrent joins the T'hung Kurym stream at right angles, and forms with it and the surrounding mountains a barrier impassable by any native invader. Here he found a matchlock behind every rock on the opposite bank of a furious river. He attempted to gain his end by diplomacy, and the gylfo, Ahmed Shah, kept the Sikhs in play till the severe weather suddenly commenced, when

Golab Singh, however, having pushed his conquests to the edge of the valley of Cashmere, soon subjected Little Tibet, which is now tributary to the Sikhs, or to the Jum-moo family.

On the eastern frontier of Ladakh lies the large province of Chan-tan, known to the Booteas as Hiundes, or Hemdes, the 'Region of Cold,' comprehending what has been called Upper Tibet. This country was formerly subject to independent princes, but their authority gradually merged in that of H'lassa (the name of the capital of Bootan), which is under the nominal authority of China, a Chinese governor residing in the city. By virtue of some ancient agreement, the wool of the shawl goat, of which this cold country is the chief resort, is sold exclusively to the people of Ladakh: hence probably arose some constructive claim on the part of the Sikhs. In the season of 1840,

* Vigne, Travels in Kashmir, vol. ii. p. 216.

Zorawur Singh, the commander of the Sikh army, marched from Leh, the capital of Ladakh, along the valley of the Sinh-ka-bab, or great eastern branch of the Indus, subjecting the places in his progress, passing the hills to Rodokh on the north, and pressing onward to Gartokh on the south-east, whence he appears to have reached the eastern shore of the celebrated Manasarowur lake. He encountered little or no opposition; the leaders of the Tibetan troops,—a few thousand rabble, unworthy of the name of soldiers,—were panic-stricken, and the inhabitants, armed and unarmed, fled in consternation before him. The deb, or chief, of Chan-tan having retreated with his forces, Zorawur Singh took possession, without resistance, of Tuklahah, a large commercial town situated in a fine valley, as extensive as that of Nepal.

The advance of the Sikhs, thus unopposed, to the northern confines of the British provinces of Gurhwal and Kumaon, excited the attention of our authorities on the frontier, and some communications passed between them and the Sikh commander, who was extremely courteous, and professed a readiness to comply with all the wishes of our Government. The political agent at Simla (Mr. Erskine) was, however, informed that the Government had resolved not to interfere in the aggressive movements of the Sikhs. Subsequently, the British commissioner in Kumaon had a conference with Zorawur Singh at Tuklahah (a place never visited before by a European), which appeared to be a city inferior only to H'lassa. With the exception of sending (with the consent of the Lahore court) a British officer (Lieutenant Cunningham) to the Sikh camp in the hills, no interruption, therefore, of their career of conquest was offered by the British Government, and the court of Nepaul seems to have been either in collusion with the Sikhs, or to have partaken of the general panic inspired by their arms. Under these favourable circumstances, Zorawur Singh continued his acquisitions, and in September, 1841, he had subdued the whole of Kulu, and possessed himself of all the strongholds in the mountains, from the right bank of the Upper Sutluj to the innermost recesses of Tibet.

His career was stopped by the Chinese commander in Chan-tan, who marched from H'lassa against the Sikhs, with an army of 10,000 men, about one-fifth Ghoorkas, and the rest Tibetans and Tartars. An action was fought in December, 1841, or January, 1842, near Tuklahah, in which the Sikh army was entirely defeated, and Zorawur Singh was slain. The victors cut off the ears and head of the Sikh general, and sent them as trophies to H'lassa. His successor in the command entered into a treaty with the Chinese general, by which the Sikhs engaged to give up their arms, and to trust to his mercy. They had, probably, deserved little mercy, and they experienced none; they were not, indeed, massacred, but they were suffered to perish with cold and hunger, save a miserable remnant, consisting of about 100, who found their way, exhausted and frost-bitten, to the British hill station of Almorah.

After the defeat and fall of Zorawur Singh, the Chinese-Tibetan army proceeded to Gartokh, expelled most of the Sikh garrisons in that province, Dapa, and other forts, and advanced to the frontiers of Ladakh. Intelligence of these events reached Golab Singh whilst he was at Peshawur, in command of the army of co-operation. He immediately proceeded to Cashmere, to collect his forces and organize his plans for the defence of Ladakh, the people of which had risen in opposition to the Sikhs upon the approach of the Chinese-Tibetan army.

The departure of Golab Singh wrought a mischievous effect upon the troops at Peshawur, who broke out again into insubordination, occasioning much apprehension to the British commanders.*

CHAPTER XXII.

THE tragical events which closed the reign of Sher Singh are still wrapped in mystery. The destruction of the chief agents; the rapid succession of revolutions, each of which almost obliterated the memory of the preceding; the dark and apparently inexplicable motives of some of the actors, and the imperfect and often contradictory reports of the native news-writers, upon which the historian is constrained to rely,* conspire to cast a cloud of obscurity over these transactions which will probably never be altogether dissipated.

It has been already related that, upon the overthrow of Chund Kowr's authority and the re-establishment of Sher Singh upon the throne, the sirdars of the Sindawala family

* These news-writers may, in ordinary times, be trusted as to facts, though not as to inferences.

(descended from a common ancestor with Runjeet Singh), who had embraced the Rani's party, fled across the Sutluj, except Lena Singh, Sindawala,* who was seized and imprisoned. Uttur Singh, the head of that family, and Ajeet Singh, the paramour of the late Rani, whilst refugees in the British territory, maintained constant intercourse with their party at the court, where a faction still remained hostile to the Jummoo family. The army was tainted with this spirit of discontent, infused and fed by the intrigues of the Sindawalas, which caused the Maharaja and his minister much uneasiness. Mr. Clerk, writing to the Indian Government, in May, 1842, said that the subject most occupying the mind of the Maharaja at that time was the position of the Sindawala chiefs, and that "there is nothing which his highness would at present feel so great an obligation as the restraining these chiefs from creating commotion in his army, and their renewing their allegiance on perfectly submissive terms to the throne." By the intervention of the British Government, a reconciliation took place, and these chiefs were recalled, pardoned, and restored to their estates.

Uttur Singh is described* as a respectable man, well versed in Sikh politics, one of Runjeet's school, and therefore he drew around him the genuine Khalsas, who revered the name of the great Maharaja. In person he was middle-sized, of stout build, with a plain, unmarked countenance, and, like the old Sikh leaders, of simple and unostentatious manners. He, however, wanted some of the qualities, including tact and political firmness, essential to a leader in those peculiar times.† Lena Singh was tall,

* Calcutta Review, No. II. p. 495.

† The writer of the Review adds: "We happened to meet Uttur Singh as he was flying from a place near the hills, where he resided when Sher Singh was murdered. It was just at night-fall: he was bivouacking on a wide plain, in the midst of a small party of forty or fifty retainers, and though he had then reached the protected Sikh states, and was comparatively safe, we found him on the alert. He was up in an instant, and did not seem half-inclined to step out a few paces from his followers to talk to a single European. After a little conversation his suspicions fled, and he very dark, much addicted to strong liquors, but having the rare character of a speaker of the truth. Ajeet Singh, nephew of Uttur, was a fat, broad-faced man, of blunt speech, good manners, but corrupt morals.

Upon the restoration of these persons and their adherents to court, Sher Singh hoped to extinguish intrigue and to lead a quiet life; but he seems to have rendered more complicated the toils which surrounded him. Lena and Ajeet were observed to have acquired the favour and confidence of the Maharaja; they received likewise demonstrations of respect and attention from Raja Dhean Singh, the minister, who was at this time raised to the highest rank next to the throne.* In the early part of the year 1843, a visible alienation was observed in Sher Singh towards his minister, or rather towards the whole Jummoo family; attempts told us very composedly the circumstances of the recent tragedy, and that then was the time for the British to seize Lahore—that it would be very easy with his help,—very difficult without.”

were made to lessen their influence, by removing their friends and dependants from office, which were filled by persons in whom the Maharaja's party could place confidence. Sher Singh, a man of easy temper, open-hearted and indolent, is not likely to have spontaneously entered upon so hazardous a scheme of policy, and to have given wanton umbrage to a man whose power was superior to his own; who had raised him to the throne, and could alone keep him there: it is evident that he must have been the passive agent of some insidious and secret advisers.

A conspiracy was formed against Sher Singh, which comprehended the Jummoo rajas, the Sindawala chiefs, and even the Fakir Uzeez-ud-deen, a party strong enough, with the army (under the command of Heera Singh), if their views had been perfectly concurrent, to have deposed the Maharaja without recourse to wholesale assassination; but it cannot be doubted that the elements of this conspiracy were discordant, and that the actors were conspiring against each other.

Raja Dhean Singh had had recourse to his customary mode of shewing his displeasure towards his master, by absenting himself from the court and paying a visit to his hill estates. The Maharaja, at the instigation of his indiscreet or treacherous advisers, commanded the raja to return; requiring him to explain his proceedings for the last five years, and to render his accounts, as well as the customary nuzzurana, or tributary presents, threatening, if he refused, to send General Ventura with a military force to fetch him. Golab Singh persuaded his brother to obey the mandate, and the raja accordingly appeared at the durbar at Amritsur, on the 9th July, 1843, when he was called upon to explain the reasons why he had proceeded to Jummoo. The answer of the proud minister cannot be better related than in the words of the news-writer.

“ Raja Dhean Singh presented himself, and having embraced the feet of his highness, was asked why he had gone to Jummoo; to which the minister answered, that there were several reasons which had induced him to do so; first, that he was anxious to see Raja Golab Singh, who was ill ; secondly, to be present at his nephew's marriage. He further begged to represent, that his highness's constant devotion to the chase and the bottle, during the greater part of the day, had a baneful effect upon the state, and reflected disgrace on the minister as well as the monarch ; and with regard to the accounts and nuzzurana required of him, they were all forthcoming, and all he possessed was the Maharaja's. He took occasion at the same time to remark on the jealousy which many of the sirdars entertained towards him. The Maharaja replied, that he should be protected."

A speech like this, delivered in open durbar, by a minister to his sovereign, although not altogether repugnant to the manners of the Sikhs, must have satisfied any one that the prince's authority rested upon a very frail foundation. Intimations were said to have been given to Sher Singh that a conspiracy was forming against him ; that his life was threatened, and the very day, the 15th September, 1843, was named

Although the Maharaja and Dhean Singh appeared to be outwardly upon good terms, yet there are sufficient indications that all cordiality had ceased, and that the former was intent upon humbling the minister and his family. With his habitual want of caution, the prince threw out hints that he designed to call Raja Golab Singh to court, in order that he might render an account of his proceedings.

Meanwhile, Sher Singh seems to have exerted himself with some energy. He frequently reviewed the troops, examining their discipline and appointments, punishing several commanders who had taken upon themselves to call out their regiments without orders; two of these officers had their tongues split, and were paraded through the camp. The congregation of the troops in the vicinity of the capital was a circumstance of suspicion; but it was supposed to be explained by the approach of the Dussera festival, which it was usual to celebrate with military spectacles. On the 7th August, Ram Chund reported that the army of the Khalsa was extending around Lahore for four kos in every direction, to which the Maharaja replied, that "it was well, as he was anxious to see the whole of his forces assembled at the Dussera."

An unauthorized and a most presumptuous step, taken by the Jummoo rajas and their party, might very reasonably have awakened the darkest suspicions in the breast of Sher Singh. Dhuleep Singh, a child of eight or nine years, who had been recognized by Runjeet Singh, towards the close of his life, as his son, with a full knowledge that he was not so, had been brought privately to Jummoo, and was now sent for by the minister to Lahore. On the 31st August, at a durbar, at which were present Dhean Singh, Soochet Singh, Heera Singh, Ajeet Singh, Lena Singh, and the Hakim Uzeez-ud-deen, the great minister informed the Maharaja that he had sent for Prince Dhuleep Singh, son of Runjeet Singh, from Jummoo, who had arrived at Lahore, and proposed that a salute should be fired upon the occasion. The Maharaja inquired why he had been brought, and desired that he might not be introduced to the durbar. The raja replied, that the boy's mother was sick, and had desired to see him. On the following day, the Maharaja directed a letter to be addressed to Golab Singh, at Jummoo, inquiring why he had sent Dhuleep Singh to Lahore, without acquainting the Maharaja; and ordered that some of his own attendants should replace those of Dhean Singh in the care of the person of Dhuleep; an arrangement which Dhean Singh opposed. At a durbar held on the 4th September, a letter was received from Golab Singh, stating that, as he was anxious to see his highness, he should shortly present himself. Private information was the same day given to Sher Singh, that Dhean Singh, Soochet Singh, Heera Singh, Lena Singh, and Ajeet Singh, had met secretly at the house of Dhuleep Singh's mother, and had been in consultation for three hours. A hurkara was appointed to watch and report the proceedings of these sirdars. The next day, after the durbar, at which General Ventura was present, the latter solicited a private audience of the Maharaja, at which he informed him, in distinct terms, that the five individuals before named had conspired against him ; that it was for that end they had sent for Dhuleep Singh, and that Golab Singh was on his way from Jummoo to aid them ; recommending him to use every precaution. Sher Singh replied, that he could not believe this of Dhean Singh, "as it was to him he owed his elevation." On the 6th the Maharaja sent for his own guru, Saheb Singh, and communicated to him the report of the conspiracy. The priest discredited it, observing that Ajeet was bound by blood to the Maharaja, and desired to know who had informed his highness. The Maharaja refused to tell, but remarked, that "if he found that Ajeet Singh was conspiring against him, he would certainly put him to death, as he had done with Rani Chund Kowr."

Golab Singh arrived at Lahore on the 8th September, and on the 9th presented himself at the durbar, when he was received most kindly by the Maharaja, and in return assured him that "he and his brothers were devotedly attached to his highness's person." The Maharaja said he should require an oath from him that he entertained no evil designs against him, from which Golab Singh excused himself for two or three days. Upon the same day, Prince Pertab Singh informed his father that he did not believe there was occasion to distrust any of the sirdars, except Ajeet Singh, who was not to be depended upon: orders were thereupon given to exclude Ajeet from the durbar during his highness's pleasure. On the 10th, a durbar was held, after dismissing which, the Maharaja took Golab Singh and Dhean Singh aside, and having assured them that he felt it was to their aid he owed his elevation, asked what they were meditating? They both placed their hands upon the Maharaja's head (a most solemn form of adjuration), and swore they were and would continue to be good servants; adding that, as far as Ajeet Singh and his troops were concerned, his highness need not fear them. On the 14th September, a durbar was held, when Dhean Singh suggested to the Maharaja that he ought to review Ajeet's troops and gain their good-will by bestowing honours and rewards upon the officers; and Sher Singh promised he would do so the next morning. On the same night, the Rani Issur Chund gave birth to a son; the Maharaja sent for a pundit to cast the infant's nativity, who reported that it was not favourable.*

On the 15th September the catastrophe took place. The accounts of this bloody transaction are so various and conflicting, that it is impossible to combine them into a consistent narrative.

The purwaneh addressed by the reigning Maharaja to his vakeel at Ferozepore, which, under ordinary circumstances, should be considered as containing the most authentic report of the facts, states, that Lena Singh and Ajeet Singh went, accompanied by Sikh and other troops, to announce the muster of their troops to the Maharaja, who was in the garden of the Shah Belawal, having gone thither to enjoy the fresh air, and amuse himself on the river. The sirdars went to him in the garden, where he was sitting, and offered him a rifle, and while the Maharaja was examining it, Ajeet Singh drew a pistol and fired at him, wounding him in the face. The two sirdars then struck off the Maharaja's head. Several of his ministers and personal attendants fell at the same time, including Boodh Singh and Gunga Singh. After this, Lena Singh went, "accidentally," to the garden of Tej Singh, near that of the Shah Belawal, and there killed Pertab Singh, son of Sher Singh, who was celebrating the festival, and beheaded him. The conspirators then proceeded towards the city, and on the road met Raja Dhean Singh, who was alone. They informed him that a disturbance had taken place in the garden; that the Maharaja had been killed, and as it would be dangerous for him to go alone there, proposed that he should return with them to the city, and take measures for settling the succession. The raja complied, and on their way, when they had approached the Kureeani gate, Ajeet drew a pistol and fired at Dhean Singh, who exclaimed, "Oh, sirdar, what a foul deed!" and laid his hand upon his sword. The followers of Ajeet then fired at the raja, who fell from his horse.

The account given by the news-writers, though equally circumstantial, is totally different from the preceding. This report states, that Sher Singh set out on horseback towards the northern gate of Lahore, to review the troops of Ajeet, as he had promised. His suwaree, or cortège, no sooner approached the regiments (about twenty), than officers and men loudly abused him; whereupon Ajeet Singh came forward, and in an insolent tone, told him he was no son of Runjeet Singh, but a purchased slave, brought up by his supposed mother. Sher Singh, astonished and provoked at this address, turned round to look for the Rajas Golab Singh and Dhean Singh; but they were not to be seen. He then discharged an arrow at Ajeet, but missed him, and that sirdar drew a pistol and shot the Maharaja through the head, who fell, and was instantly beheaded by Ajeet. General Ventura, having been informed of this event, drew out his troops against those of Ajeet Singh; but the latter were so superior in numbers that he was obliged to retire, leaving 200 men on the field. He hurried to Pertab Singh, to inform him of what had happened. The prince ordered out his two regiments, and issuing from the city, met Ajeet at the head of his troops, and saw his father's head borne on a spear. The sirdar immediately attacked the prince, slew him with his own hand, and beheaded him.

Major Lawrence, who states that he has heard the transaction related by many people (Generals Avitabili and Court included) in as many different ways, gives the following as the most probable account. The Maharaja, having been warned of some calamity, sent his son out of the way to General Court, to see a gun cast. Sher Singh was inspecting a party of sowars, when Ajeet Singh stepped up, under pretence of shewing him a double-barreled gun (the prince being a great gun-fancier), and shot him dead. A scuffle ensued, in which Boodh Singh and others fell. Soon afterwards, Pertab Singh was met, returning from the foundry, and instantly despatched.*

The assassination of Dhean Singh is likewise variously related. It is, however, agreed that he was either stabbed or shot by Ajeet Singh, and it is suggested that this deed was prompted by the Bhae Goormukh Singh, a man of little ability but of great cunning, who affected a reputation for deep piety, which he made subservient to intrigue. This man bore a secret enmity to Dhean Singh, and when the assassin Ajeet told him he had killed the prince, declared that his life was not safe an hour unless he destroyed the minister.

By this act, the Sindawala party held themselves out to the world as the prime agents in this conspiracy,—coveting all the advantages and incurring all its odium and responsibility. Heera Singh, the son of Dhean Singh, with great decision and promptitude, accompanied by his uncle Soochet Singh and other sirdars, hastened to the nearest body of regular troops, harangued them with spirit and resolution, telling them that the murders perpetrated by the Sindawalas had made those sirdars masters of the state: he denounced their crimes, expatiated upon their treachery, and concluded a pathetic address by a proposition pregnant with eloquence—he offered them liberal gratuities, and promised to discharge all the arrears, and raise the pay one-half, of all who would follow him and revenge the murder of their sovereign, his son, and his minister. This appeal had its due effect; the troops demanded to be led against the assassins, declaring that they would not sit down to a meal until they had destroyed the faithless Sindawala sirdars. In the course of the day succeeding the assassination, 50,000 troops surrounded the citadel, in which Ajeet Singh, Lena Singh, and their adherents, had hastily thrown themselves, Uttur Singh having effected his escape. A heavy cannonade was opened upon the place, which continued during the night. The next day, repeated assaults were made, and repelled by the besieged, who, knowing that their lives were at stake, offered a desperate defence. Towards the evening, however, the citadel was carried by storm; Ajeet Singh and Lena Singh, with many of the garrison, to the number of 600, were put to the sword. The head of Ajeet was brought to Heera Singh, who ordered the body of his father's murderer to be cut in pieces, which were exposed upon the different gates of the city. His house was destroyed, and it was decreed that thenceforward his lands should be no longer ploughed with oxen, but with asses.

The effect of these sudden and rapid revolutions was to place the conduct of affairs in the hands of Heera Singh, a young man of twenty-three, who appears to have developed talents suited to the emergency, and for which he had not hitherto obtained credit. With the aid of his uncles, and the influence he derived from his position and popularity, when the boy Dhuleep Singh was proclaimed Maharaja, Heera Singh was nominated his vuzeer.

Whilst these tragedies were enacted, the city was in a state of uproar and disorder. The soldiers plundered at their will; murder was committed in the open day ; all business was suspended, and those who were able to escape (including the French commanders of the Sikh army) rejoiced to fly from this scene of horrors.

The funeral ceremonies of the late Maharaja were performed with a respect which implied, or was intended to imply, that the individuals now in power were not accessory to his assassination. Sher Singh had three wives; but, though no suttees are mentioned as having dishonoured his pile, no less than eighteen women, wives and concubines of Dhean Singh, are reported to have burnt themselves with his corpse. A deputation was sent to the British authorities at Ferozepore, to obtain permission for the transport of the ashes of Sher Singh and Dhean Singh across the Sutluj to the Ganges at Hurdwar.

The character of Sher Singh exhibits no qualities which are calculated to inspire us with any extraordinary commiseration for his fate. He was a man of average ability, and of much courage; but a thorough sensualist. He was enamoured of European manners, which he affected so far as to rouse the jealousy of Runjeet, who was a strict Sikh. Unhappily, Sher Singh, like many other Eastern imitators of the customs and habits of Europe, copied those only in which imitation is least to be desired or commended. He had some knowledge of our language, in which he was desirous that his son should be instructed, and when the Rev. Mr. Wolff visited Cashmere, in October, 1833, Sher Singh, then its governor, desired to be furnished with a copy of our New Testament. It is now well understood that he was no son of Runjeet, who never acknowledged him (except by allowing him a chair in his presence), and his twin-brother, Tara Singh, was treated by that prince with uniform neglect, and lived unnoticed, except as a dissolute profligate in the common bazars, at Lahore. When governor of Cashmere, Sher's indolence left the management of affairs in the hands of Jemadar Khooshal Singh, whose exactions impoverished and depopulated that province, from whence Sher Singh was in consequence removed. He, however, gained some reputation by the successful expedition against the fanatic Seyud Ahmed. He is described as a fine, manly-looking fellow by Captain Osborne. Other writers represent even his personal features less favourably. His countenance was not unpleasing when he smiled, but the eye expressed violence and imperiousness, and the lower part of the face indicated the vilest sensuality. His manners were often marked by unbecoming freedom.* Captain Osborne relates the following incident as occurring in 1838, at the durbar. Runjeet Singh, anxious that the deputation sent to receive the mission from the Governor-General should do credit to his court by the splendour of their appearance, ordered the persons who composed it to attend him previous to their setting out. After complimenting Soochet Singh upon his dress and jewels, he angrily demanded of Sher Singh why he was without his usual magnificent ornaments. The Koonwur, touching the hilt of his sword, replied, "I am a soldier, and this is the only jewel I value." The Maharaja, however, insisted upon knowing what had become of them, and at last extorted the confession from Sher Singh, that they were in the royal treasury, having been presented by him to Runjeet, as a nuzzur, and accepted, some months before.

Pertab Singh, who was only twelve years of age when involved in the late massacre, was a very promising youth, full of spirit and energy. Sher Singh was extravagantly fond of him. Captain Osborne says, he was one of the most intelligent boys he ever met with. His person was good-looking, with singularly large and expressive eyes. His manners were easy, polished, and in the highest degree graceful and engaging.

CHAPTER XXIII.

A.D. 1843 TO 1845.

UNDER a minor sovereign, at a court where so many who might have been competitors or enemies had been swept away, the vuzeer, or minister, was the absolute ruler of the Punjab. The favour which had been bestowed upon Heera Singh by Runjeet, though acquired in a manner which, in any other country, would have rendered him infamous for ever,* gave him a strong hold upon the Sikh nation, who venerated the memory of their first ruler. His family connections and hereditary power placed him in the highest rank of the Punjabi nobility. The command of the army had established his relation with a body which had the power of disposing of the throne itself. The sympathy generally felt for the fate of his father tended to strengthen the other ties of attachment to him, which were still further cemented by his personal qualities. Heera Singh was strikingly handsome, though somewhat effeminate in his appearance. Shrewd and intelligent, good-tempered, urbane, and entertaining, "he is certainly," says Captain Osborne, "one of the most amiable and popular persons at the court of Lahore."

With all these advantages, however, Heera Singh's position was one of great difficulty and peril. The convulsions which had brought him to the surface of power, and cast him upon his present eminence, had deranged all the machinery and functions of the government, whilst the army, upon which he was constrained to depend, was an unruly and insatiable monster, whose voracity, after exhausting every expedient, he found it in the end impossible to appease.

In conjunction with his uncles, Golab and Soochet, and Lena Singh, Majethia,* he

* Lena Singh, Majethia, the son of Desa Singh, one of Runjeet's companions, and who has been often confounded with his namesake of the Sindawala family (who was an ignorant drunkard), is a man of talents and respectability, designed probably, in more quiet times, addressed letters to the provinces, retained the great officers in their posts, and, by soothing measures, endeavoured to tranquillize the minds of both chiefs and people. He caused the Bhae Goormukh Singh and Misr Benee Ram* to be imprisoned; they were placed in the custody of the governor of the Jalendra Doab, and have not since been heard of. The citadel was occupied by a strong garrison of Golab Singh's hill-men, and at length Heera began to feel times, to act a conspicuous part in Sikh politics. He is not merely educated, but has a taste for the sciences, especially astronomy and mechanics. He was Runjeet's master of the ordnance, and exhibited much ingenuity in casting guns, shrapnel-shells, &c. He had always the reputation of integrity and rectitude of purpose, and is said to be the only really respectable man (according to European notions) amongst the Sikh sirdars. He is about forty-three years of age, of middle stature, inclined to corpulency; his features are good, though rather heavy. His manners are mild and pleasing, with none of the rudeness of the old sirdars. He seems to have taken no decided part in the early revolutions at Lahore, quietly recognizing the victor, and if he did not approve of his measures, absenting himself from the durbar.

The whole history of Heera Singh's administration is little more than a narrative of his endeavours to keep the troops in subordination to him. Large sums were from time to time distributed amongst them, but their appetite grew from what it fed on. The officers lost their control over the men, and when expostulated with by the vuzeer, frankly declared their inability to manage them. Attempts were made to remove some of the most refractory from Lahore, and to introduce Hindustanis into the army; but the success of these attempts was limited: the great body of the troops remained in the vicinity of the capital. At the earnest entreaty of his nephew, Golab brought a large body of hill-men from Jum-moo, who for a time overawed the Khalsas. Having endeavoured to conciliate the sirdars and to restore discipline amongst the soldiers, whom he threatened with punishment, the raja returned to his principality, having renewed the family compact with Heera Singh, and carrying off, with the connivance

It was not long before a coolness appeared between the young minister and Soochet Singh, his uncle. Like all the Dogur family, Soochet was extremely handsome, of a noble and commanding figure, but was far inferior to his brothers in intellect. As a soldier, he was brave and chivalrous, but deficient in the qualities of a leader. Vain, conceited, and proud, he thought himself treated with less consideration by Heera Singh than he was entitled to claim, and had always cherished, on that account, a dislike of him. He was a dissolute man, and having lost the roof of his mouth by the use of violent medicines, he could not articulate, being almost, if not quite, dumb. This infirmity, which debarred him from acting a prominent part in state affairs, preyed upon his spirits and soured his temper. He began to absent himself from the durbar, and at length, all Golab's efforts to reconcile his brother and nephew failing, the former returned to his estates.

Dogur family was fomented by the Mae Chund, mother of Dhuleep Singh, a clever woman, and her brother, Jowahir Singh, an intriguing, dissipated man, destitute of talent or influence. The former complained that her son was secluded by Heera Singh; that she was not regent during his minority, and that the minister had rejected a proposal of marriage made to Dhuleep Singh by the Sirdar of Roopur on behalf of his daughter. Golab Singh in vain strove to pacify the Mae, who threatened to take her son from the gudi. On the 24th November, 1843, Jowahir Singh managed by stratagem to remove the young Maharaja from the harem, and carried him out of the city to the lines of the troops, to whom he represented that Heera Singh had laid a plot for the destruction of the young prince, and implored them to take him under their protection. The officers, doubting the truth of this story, separated the prince from his uncle, and privately communicated the occurrence to Heera, who proceeded to the camp, convinced the soldiers that the charge was false, re-conveyed the young Maharaja to the fort, and threw Jowahir Singh into irons.

This measure of justifiable severity exasperated the Mae, whose cause was espoused by Raja Soochet Singh, between whom and his nephew an open rupture took place. These incipient disorders occasioned apprehensions at the capital; many sirdars quitted the court, and General Ventura and the other European officers left the Sikh service. Large sums of money as well as jewels were removed from Lahore to the hills, and it was remarked that, at the installation of the young Maharaja, which took place on the 2nd February, 1844, the koh-i-noor diamond was not amongst the ornaments which adorned the person of the prince.

In this state of things, two other adopted sons of Runjeet, born in his zenana, named Kashmeera Singh and Peshora Singh, who had distant commands, but were weak young men, excited the suspicions of Heera Singh, and he contrived to have them placed in custody. The troops, however, demanded their liberation, and the minister was obliged to comply. Provoked by persecution, or encouraged by the favour shewn them by the army, they renounced allegiance to Dhuleep Singh, and in February took post with a few adherents at Sealkote, on the left bank of the Chenab. Their confidence was not without grounds, for when the vuzeer ordered some Khalsa regiments to march to Sealkote, their officers flatly refused, declaring that they would not fight against the sons of their old master, and a body of troops sent against the princes from Peshawur joined them.

At this juncture, Raja Soochet Singh, being informed that the army at Lahore was disaffected, and would gladly obey his orders, came down from Ramnuggur, with a small force, towards the capital. Heera, by dint of largesses and promises, prevailed upon the army not to desert him, and on the 27th March moved out with 20,000 men, cavalry, infantry, and artillery, against his uncle, who, with barely 600 followers, had occupied a fakir's dwelling, a few miles from Lahore. Soochet refused all terms, and rushing with characteristic impetuosity and rashness upon the Khalsa troops, fell, with Rae Kesree

Singh, an able and gallant officer, and many others, sword in hand. Heera Singh is said to have shed tears at the fate of his gallant uncle, which in no degree improved his situation.

This event caused the two princes to evacuate Sealkote; but they were now joined by a Sikh sodee, or priest, named Bhae Bheer Singh, who seems to have acquired some influence by his reputed sanctity. Their cause soon received an accession of strength in Uttur Singh, Sindawala, and Lena Singh, Majethia. The former, after the revolution of September, 1843, had fled across the Sutluj, and taken refuge first at Puteala, and then at Thanesur, Sikh states under British protection. Lena Singh, having received some disgust, quitted Lahore in April, 1844, and on pretence of a pilgrimage to Hurdwar, paid a visit to Uttur Singh, who seduced him from the prudent maxims which had hitherto guided his political conduct, and he consented to league with the princes. The junction of these sirdars gave some countenance to a false report that their enterprise was encouraged by the British

The Bhae and the two princes, at the head of about 6,000 men, marched from the upper part of the Bari doab down the right bank of the Beas, till they were joined by the malcontent sirdars, who crossed the Sutluj at Huree-ke-puttun. As soon as intelligence of this movement reached Heera Singh, though alarmed, he lost no time in taking measures to meet the danger. Convening the officers of the army at Lahore, he told them that Uttur Singh was coming to seize the Sikh kingdom, and give it up to the British; adding, that he was only a servant of the Khalsaji, and was ready to obey its orders; "but," he artfully added, "if Uttur Singh should succeed, and give up six annas in the rupee to the British, whence would the troops get their present high rate of pay?" He touched a chord which instantly responded; the soldiers declared, with enthusiasm, that they would march against Uttur Singh, and not spare even the guru.

twenty-four regiments of infantry, a large body of irregular cavalry, and 120 guns,—a force with which it was utterly hopeless to contend. On the evening of the 6th he came up with the enemy, who had fallen back to a strong position at the village of Nouringabad, about fifteen miles from the right bank of the Beas. On the morning of the 7th, the Khalsa troops advanced to attack the insurgents, who were drawn up in line. Previous to the engagement, Bheer Singh having waved his chudder, the signal was understood by the opposite party as an ensign of peace; whereupon an officer was sent by Heera Singh across a branch of the Beas, which separated the combatants, and being assured by the Bhae that he was disposed to come to terms, offered the following conditions, namely, that Uttur Singh should be given up; and that the Khalsa army should be allowed to pass the stream unmolested, and occupy the position of the insurgents. Uttur Singh hearing this, drew a pistol and shot the officer through the head. This was the signal for a fierce and sanguinary conflict. After a heavy cannonade

(which was heard at the British station of Ferozepore), the Khalsa troops charged. Bheer Singh, who had been mortally wounded by a cannon ball, was cut to pieces; Uttur Singh, selling his life dearly, was likewise killed, and his head sent to Lahore. Kashmeera Singh also fell, refusing to surrender; Lena Singh fled, and crossing the Sutluj, ultimately found his way to Benares, where he still resides. Peshora Singh, who seems to have had some misgivings, deserted his own cause at the commencement of the battle. The wreck of the insurgent army, which had suffered severely in the cannonade, fled across the Beas, and many, including 200 women, wives of a Sikh corps which had deserted to the princes at Sealkote, were drowned in the river.

The Khalsa troops, in the excitement of victory, exasperated at the report that the British authorities had fomented this insurrection, determined to cross the Sutluj, and attack Ferozepore. The political agent at that place was informed, on the 9th May, that 20,000 Sikhs, with sixty guns, were on their march to the river, and that boats had been collected to convey them across during the night, at a ghat about ten miles north of Ferozepore. All the British troops at the station were accordingly collected to repel the aggression; but it appeared that Heera Singh, having been informed by his vakeel that the British authorities were wholly unconcerned in the expedition of Uttur Singh, had recalled the army to Lahore.

This success, which was celebrated with great rejoicings at that city, confirmed for a time the authority of Heera Singh, who, on the 28th June, was formally installed in the office of chief minister, in the presence of all the military and other authorities, under the title of "Raja Saheb." He took advantage of the anti-English temper of the army to dismiss the Europeans remaining in the Sikh service, on the ground that they made themselves acquainted with all that passed in the Lahore cabinet, and imparted the information to the English. He declared that "there was no faith to be found in Christians," and from this moment the young minister seems to have entertained very unfriendly feelings towards the British. In concert with his dewan, a Hindu, named Jella Pundit, a shrewd, clever man of business, he laboured to reform the army, granting their discharge to all Sikh soldiers who sought it; disbanding such regiments as could be so got rid of, and filling their places with Punjabi Mahomedans, Afghans, and Hindustanis.

But whilst the capital was restored to temporary quiet, the provinces were in a state of utter disorder. Anarchy, systematic plunder, and private assassination, were carried on without let or hindrance, in the absence of all legal restraints.

Meanwhile, symptoms of coolness, if not estrangement, appeared between the Raja Saheb and his powerful uncle, Golab Singh. The death of Soochet, of which Heera was the cause, seems to have sown the first seeds of this enmity, which was diligently fostered by the widow of Soochet Singh, a woman of restless disposition, who is said to have importuned the British authorities, as well as Dost Mahomed Khan of Cabul, for troops to revenge the death of her husband. Golab is represented at this time to have espoused the cause of Peshora Singh, whom he con-

On the 20th September, Sawun Mull, the nazim, or governor, of Multan, for the Maharaja of the Sikhs, was assassinated. For a time Heera Singh bore the odium of this act, it being supposed that he desired the removal of a powerful officer, who designed to seize the sovereignty of that rich province. It appeared, however, that he was shot by a criminal whilst under examination before him. He was a man of great vigour and ability, and the prosperity of the province is mainly attributable to his administration. He was succeeded in the office by his son, Mulraj.

Towards the close of the year 1844, the Dussera having passed over quietly, the army being satisfied with the largesses they from time to time received, a reconciliation took place between Golab and his nephew; Meean Jowahir Singh, the brother of Heera, having visited Jummo, and Meean Sohun Singh, eldest son of Golab (and adopted heir of Soochet), bringing a friendly message from his father. This adjustment, after both parties had armed for war, may be in part ascribed to the assemblage of a large body of British troops at this time within a few easy marches of the Sutluj.

An interval of about two months was passed in comparative quiet, but it was the repose which precedes a hurricane. On the 21st December another sanguinary revolution annihilated the few vestiges of regular government which remained at Lahore, and transferred the sovereign authority to a mutinous army.

The real causes of this convulsion are still but imperfectly known. It appears, however, that the fall of the Raja Saheb may be attributed to the agency of three parties,—the old Khalsa chiefs, who always entertained a dislike to the Dogur family; the mother and uncle of the young Maharaja, suspicious of designs against him, or actuated by a thirst for power; and the army, which could not obtain from an impoverished treasury the extravagant donations they demanded. Jowahir Singh, backed by his sister and by some of the officers of the army, desired a military command. The Raja Sahab was too wary to clothe so dangerous an enemy with power, but he gave him a jagir, requiring him to reside upon it. Jowahir Singh, however, proceeded to Amritsur, where he caballed against the minister, who summoned him to Lahore, and, upon his tardy arrival, determined, by the advice of Pundit Jella, not only to cut him off, and confine the Mae herself, but to dethrone Dhuleep Singh, and place the infant son of Sher Singh upon the gudi. He was not, however, aware of the full extent of his weakness and his danger. The punchayets, or deputies of five from each corps, — for the Sikh army made known its wishes, like Cromwell's, by the medium of agitators, — had formally renounced their allegiance to the Raja Sahab, and pledged themselves to acknowledge no authority but that of the Mae, and such minister as she should appoint. The Mae Chunda, on her part, declared that, unless Heera Singh retired from office, she would withdraw, with her son, from Lahore. On the 19th December, Heera Singh ordered that Jowahir Singh should be placed under restraint in his own house, and prepared to seize him, with a party of hill-men, of whom he had about 2,000 in the fort. This was no sooner known, than the army assembled, and the minister was compelled to abandon the scheme. Next morning, Heera Singh summoned the officers of the army, and told them that he had been placed in his high office by the will of the troops; that his authority was now disputed by the Mae and her party; that he did not covet power, and was ready, if the army desired it, to transfer his authority to any other hands they might deem fitter for its exercise, and to accept an inferior employment, if he could thereby render a service to the state. The officers required time to deliberate and consult with the troops, whom the Mae and her partisans had, in the meantime, secured by telling them that the minister's pecuniary resources were exhausted, and by promising them large rewards for removing a wicked minister, who oppressed the people and meditated the destruction of their sovereign. On the 21st, the troops assembled, when Jowahir Singh, by his own authority, carried the Maharaja from his apartments, placed him upon his state elephant, and proceeding to the parade, accompanied by most of the influential sirdars at Lahore, presented him to the soldiers.

Heera Singh, who had waited in his house the issue of the affair, now made preparations for flight to Jummoo. At dawn on the 22nd, he secretly quitted Lahore, with Jella Pundit, Sohun Singh (brother of Raja Golab), Lab Singh, and a few other adherents, joining about 600 sowars, with some elephants laden with treasure, without the walls, leaving the hill troops to defend his house. As soon as the flight of the minister became known, he was pursued by Jowahir Singh, at the head of a body of troops, who came up with the fugitives at a place called the Jemadar's Baoli (well), about thirteen miles from Lahore. Heera Singh prepared to face his pursuers; but now, for the first time, discovered that his own escort were traitors or cowards, who deserted him. He took shelter, with the small party who adhered to him in this desperate emergency, in a house, which was surrounded by the Khalsa troops, who fired it. The party was compelled to come forth; Heera offered to surrender, but was instantly cut down; Pundit Jella, who had rendered himself very obnoxious, Sohun Singh, Lab Singh, and the minister's secretary, Dewan Chund, shared the same fate. The heads of the principals were brought to Lahore, and after being paraded through the city, were stuck upon the gates.

Jowahir Singh, on his return to Lahore, proceeded to the house of Heera Singh, which, with its treasure, amounting to 50,000*l.*, was given up without resistance by the guard, who even entered the service of the state. The measures of the conspirators seem to have been so well taken, that this revolution was attended by little or no bloodshed at the capital, and riot and disorder were in a great measure prevented, by excluding, as much as possible, the troops from the city.

"Thus fell," says a chronicler of these events,* "a personage who, whatever estimate may have been formed of him prior to his elevation to power, exhibited after it qualities which, in less intractable circumstances, might have secured to him a long tenure of authority. How far his acts may have been the result of his own prudence and judgment, or how far they may have been dictated by stern necessity, could only be determined by time and experience. His fall seems to have been brought about by causes independent of his own merits or demerits, arising from that total disorganization of the state which every one foresaw would follow the death of Runjeet Singh."

The number of suttees consequent upon this revolution was no less than twenty-four; namely, two widows and ten slaves of Heera Singh; two widows and five slaves of Sohun Singh; a widow and two slaves of Lab Singh; the widow of Pundit Jella, and the widow (only fourteen) of Dewan Chund.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE subversion of the Raja Saheb's power, which, resting upon no solid foundation, had fallen to pieces by a slight touch, was accomplished with far more facility than the erection of a new fabric of government, for which no adequate provision seems to have been made. The avenue to the vuzeerat was open to Jowahir Singh, and the Mae (or Rani) Chunda proposed that her brother should be nominated minister; but the troops rejected the proposal, and, with a strange inconsistency or perversity, caused letters to be written to Lena Sing, Majethia, then at Benares, and to Peshora Singh, residing at Ferozepore, both of whom they had made exiles, inviting the former to accept the post of minister, and the latter that of commander-in-chief of the army. The prince, the least qualified person of the two for the post tendered to him, eagerly embraced the offer, and arrived at Lahore on the 1st January, 1845. He was well received by the troops, and upon his appearance at the durbar, he unbuckled his sword and placed it at the feet of the Maharaja. But this token of submissiveness did not disarm the jealousy of the Rani Chunda and her brother, who had sufficient influence to baulk his ambition, and he was honourably exiled, with a jagir of 4,000*l.* per annum, in the neighbourhood of Sealkote. The prince, it is said, secretly sounded the troops, who at first manifested an inclination to uphold his pretensions; but finding that he had nothing to give them, whilst the Rani was prodigal of jewels and bracelets, they recommended "patience" to the prince, who proceeded to his estate. Lena Singh, with less ambition or more discretion, declined the glittering bait, and, notwithstanding urgent messages, remained in his secure retreat at Benares.

Meanwhile, the evils of a dissolution of authority were not slow to appear. On the 23rd December, a grand durbar was held, at which the sirdars congratulated each other upon the emancipation of the state from the oppressions of the Dogur family, and issued their summons to Golab Singh to appear at Lahore and account for the treasures he had abstracted during the rule of Dhean Singh and Heera Singh. The recal of the European officers was likewise ordered, with a view of commencing military operations against the potent Raja of Jummoo. But these demonstrations were altogether futile in the existing state of the troops, who acted as if they were the real depositaries of the sovereign power, and absolved from all responsibility, abusing, beating, imprisoning, and expelling their officers, and maltreating all who shewed the slightest inclination to contravene their will. In one of their excesses, Jowahir Singh brought the young Maharaja before them, and endeavoured to soothe them, and by reasoning and admonition restore them to subordination ; but they paid no mark of respect to the prince, and told the sirdar that he had better retire, adding, that they were determined to have only those whom they pleased to rule and lead them.

Jowahir Singh seems very soon to have fallen into complete disgrace with the army, who threatened to banish him from the city.

All military operations were now undertaken by the sole direction of the army authorities, namely, the punchayets, or regimental committees; and these operations were dictated by a desire for plunder rather than by a regard for state policy, or the safety of the country. Meean Jowahir Singh, the younger brother of Heera Singh, upon the first news of the late revolution, hastened to Jesrowta, the capital of the family possessions in the hills, where their valuables were deposited, a large portion of which he removed to the fortress of his uncle at Jum-moo. The army despatched a force under Sham Singh, Atareewala, to get possession of Jesrowta, which was accomplished by the usual treachery, the troops offering to place the Meean in the office of vuzeer, upon condition that he paid down a certain sum, and engaged to raise their pay. Young Jowahir believing this offer to be as sincere as it was characteristic, fell into the snare, and admitted a party of the troops into the fort; but, soon discovering his error, he fled to Jummoo. The army plundered the place, as well as all the villages subject to the Dogur family in the neighbourhood, the zemindars and inhabitants flocking to Jummoo to implore the protection of Golab Singh.

The details of the administration were at this time carried on (subject to the wishes of the army) by the Rani Chunda, Jowahir Singh, and Bhae Ram Singh, the guardian of the Maharaja, a man of character and energy. The Rani was a person of some accomplishments for a Sikh lady, being skilful in the use of her pen, whereby, it is supposed, she was able to arrange and combine the means of Heera Singh's overthrow; but, belonging to no high family (being the daughter of a respectable zemindar), she possessed no family influence. She presided in person in the council, within a purdah (curtain), outside of which sat the boy Maharaja. Her brother was a man of no talents, uneducated, and addicted to low dissipation. The Rani's party was strengthened by the recal of the Sindawala chiefs, who had been banished after the revolution of September, 1843, and who returned to Lahore on the 30th January, where they were received with great distinction.

The state of the country was such as might be expected where government was in abeyance, or, what is worse, in the hands of an ignorant, bloodthirsty, rapacious, and insubordinate army. The capital was a scene of turbulence and disorder; the Sikh chiefs, in their feudal castles, ruled as petty sovereigns; the Alpine Punjab, from Rajaoree to Attock, and the Sind-sagur Doab to Mit-tunkote, were in a ferment. Sheikh Golan Mohi-ud-deen, the governor of Cashmere, a bold, crafty, time-serving Mahomedan, was making arrangements for renouncing his allegiance, having opened a negotiation with some British authorities; and Multan was in the hands of the family of Sawun Mull.

From this period the history of the Punjab is little more than a foul chronicle of the extravagancies of its mutinous army, the follies and crimes of the individuals who, for selfish purposes, sought by vile arts to propitiate its favour, and their gross and shameless debaucheries.

The hope of plunder impelled the military rulers to send a force of about 9,000 men, in February, against Golab Singh, who, removing the greater part of his treasure to an impregnable fortress, intrenched himself at Jummoo, and waited the attack at the head of a considerable force. Upon the arrival of the Khalsa troops near his capital, the raja resorted to craft, in which he was an adept. He negotiated at the same time with Lal Singh, the commander of the Sikh army, and directly with the troops themselves, through the agency of his son, Meean Punnea, who consented to pay down to the soldiers five lakhs, and to transmit, at some future time, fifty lakhs to the treasury. A party of Khalsa troops, accordingly, proceeded to Jummoo, and brought away the money; but, on their return, they were set upon by a detachment of hill-men, who re-took the treasure, and put nearly all the party to the sword. The Khalsa troops, exasperated at this successful act of treachery, but more at the loss of the money, attacked the raja, but were repulsed by him with considerable loss, and shortly after, he fell unexpectedly upon the Khalsa camp, and killed about 2,000, including several sirdars and officers of distinction.

This intelligence caused much alarm at Lahore, and the Rani, finding that Golab Singh's strength had been underrated, was anxious for an accommodation. Her fears were augmented by the news that Golab had succeeded in corrupting the Khalsa troops opposed to him, a great proportion of whom had joined his army, which, numbering 17,000 men, was following, with hasty marches, the few corps that had remained faithful. On the 6th April, Golab arrived with his army on the north bank of the Ravi, where he was joined by some of the discontented troops from Lahore, and a considerable body of men belonging to the widow of Soochet Singh. It was now manifest that this movement of the hill raja had been preconcerted with the leaders of the army and some of the chiefs at Lahore, for Golab Singh, after some decent hesitation, accepted an invitation to enter the city, where he was received with great honour. Jowahir Singh, whose enmity towards the Dogur raja was known, was not admitted to the durbar, when Golab was present, till he had laid aside his arms. Upon that occasion the politic raja offered his first mark of respect to the Rani, laying his head upon the ground before her purdah, and then he made his reverence to the Maharaja. After this, the Rani took Golab's hand and that of her brother, and, joining them, made both swear to renounce their mutual enmity. The vuzeerat was now offered to Golab, which he prudently declined, but accepted the command of the army; a nominal office, the troops acknowledging no authority, and dictating their own orders.

In the month of May, these contentions were suspended by a dreadful visitation of the cholera morbus, which first appeared at Lahore on the 5th, and in the course of the month swept off from 500 to 700 victims each day. On the 26th May, 2,000 matchlocks, and a vast number of golden bracelets, belonging to soldiers who had died of this disease, were brought into the treasury. Before the pestilence began to abate, in June, not fewer than 22,000 persons had perished. Consternation seized the troops as well as the citizens; all business was at an end; the city was almost deserted; the villages and towns (including Amritsur) were thronged with fugitives, who spread the plague far and wide in the provinces. Frightful as have been the devastations of this mysterious scourge in other places, it has, perhaps, nowhere made greater havoc of human life than in the Punjab.

Before the disease had reached an alarming height, the Rani succeeded, after long and angry discussions with the troops, in obtaining, or rather purchasing, their consent to the nomination of her brother to the vuzeerat for four years, when the minority of the Maharaja would expire; and Jowahir Singh, accordingly, with the concurrence of Golab Singh, on the 14th May, was formally installed in an office which he was destined to hold but for four months.

The cholera had scarcely ceased its ravages before the court and army relapsed into their former extravagances. Authentic details have been furnished by the British agent* of the debauchery which prevailed amongst the rulers of Lahore in the months of June, July, and August, 1845, and they are almost without a parallel.

On the 5th June, the punchayets proceeded in a body to the palace to remonstrate against Jowahir Singh's continuance in the government, reproaching that sirdar to his face with drunkenness and incapacity. They went to the Rani, and insisted upon seeing her, requiring the dismissal of her brother from the vuzeerat and the substitution of Dewan Deena Nath, Bhugut Ram, or Lal Singh, or the three conjointly. The Rani was divided between her family regard for her brother, and her illicit attachment to Lal Singh, her favourite paramour; she at length effected a reconciliation between the two, cementing the tie by a present to each of a handsome slave-girl, sent from the Mundi chief. Soon after this, Jowahir Singh and Lal Singh were seeking to assassinate each other. The vuzeer was often so drunk, having caroused all night with his favourites and women, that he could not hold a durbar. The Rani herself, besides her unbridled profligacy with her paramours, indulged in similar excesses, and in August her mental faculties became seriously impaired by these indulgences ; she had lost all her vivacity and sunk almost into a state of stupor, from which she could be roused only by the stimulus of strong drink. Men of low origin, horse-jockeys, palace peons, and menial servants, were admitted to the vuzeer's society and confidence. On the 2nd August, when a letter from the Governor-General waited for an answer, none could be sent, Jowahir Singh, the Rani, and even the young Maharaja, being all drunk. The next day, again, there was no durbar, Jowahir Singh and the members of the council being intoxicated ; they would attend to no business, but sent for dancing-girls, and Jowahir, emulating the worst examples at ancient Rome, dressed himself as a dancing-girl and danced with them.

Such a state of things at the capital invited insurrection in the provinces ; Peshora Singh accordingly raised the standard of revolt, and his progress alarmed the Rani and her dissolute council. Some battalions were prevailed upon to march against the prince, but, instead of resisting, they went over to him. In June, he surprised a party conveying six lakhs of government treasure, which he seized. Troops were sent to Seal-kote to compel him to disgorge the booty, but, either through cowardice or treachery, they were defeated with considerable loss. In the same month, the prince got possession, by stratagem, of the fort of Attock, and three battalions of Khalsa troops marched ostensibly to recover the place in August, but they joined the standard of Peshora Singh. A stratagem was now resorted to, which succeeded with this weak prince. By the contrivance of the vuzeer, he was invited to Lahore, with a secret assurance that the leading sirdars were resolved to place him upon the gudi, and that the army was in his interest. The general, Chuttur Singh, Atareewala, after much hesitation, entered into this plot, and it is supposed (but the fact is not yet placed beyond doubt) that the Koonwur Peshora Singh was by his

The discerning eye of Golab Singh seems to have perceived premonitory symptoms of another revolution, and with his characteristic discretion he removed from the scene of danger, alleging a desire to pay a short visit to his estates. This was at the end of August. In the succeeding month, the army proceeded deliberately to make a change in the machinery of the government, and the coolness and regularity of their motions prove how complete was the supremacy they had established.

It appears from the most authentic report* we yet have of this transaction, that, about the middle of September, the army assembled in a camp in the plain of Mujan Meer, on the south-east side of Lahore, establishing strict discipline towards the city and the neighbourhood. The punchayets held nightly meetings, and in the morning issued the orders determined upon, under the designation belonging to the Sikh sect before the reign of Runjeet Singh, namely, Khalsaji-ka Punt'h. They sent letters bearing their seal, inscribed merely with the name of the deity, to all local officers, military leaders, and members of the durbar, requiring their obedience or their presence, and in short assumed the executive functions of the government. They issued their commands to the Rani to repair to the camp, with her son, and to deliver up her brother and the murderers of Peshora Singh, if he was really dead, intimating that disobedience would entail upon her their punishment. The Rani endeavoured to negotiate with the troops, but found them inexorable. Jowahir Singh vainly hoped to hold the fort with the new levies and the artillery, commanded by his minions and partisans, but he soon found that these troops were ready to obey the orders of the Khalsa Punt'h. On the 19th September, the Rani and the vuzeer despatched the dewan Deena Nath, the fakir Noor-ud-deen, and Uttur Singh, Kaleewala, to prevail upon the troops to return to their allegiance, suggesting fears of an invasion by the English; and it appears that when the vuzeer first learned the irritation of the army at the news of Peshora Singh's death, he endeavoured to divert their indignation from him by measures calculated to precipitate a collision with the British troops, which, however, was prevented by the more prudent members of the durbar. The troops immediately made those deputies prisoners, or rather hostages, releasing the fakir, whom they sent to warn the Rani that the following day was the last allowed to her for compliance with their commands. They at the same time, by written orders under seal of the Punt'h, required the troops in the fort to take care that no one escaped, and posted guards at each gate of the city for the like purpose. The vuzeer corrupted the troops at the fort, who connived at his evasion in the night of the 20th; but he was stopped by the troops at the gate, and obliged to return in despair.

In the afternoon of the 21st it was announced that four battalions had marched from the camp towards the city, to destroy all persons remaining in the fort, the garrison of which had joined the troops at Mujan

Meer. Immediate compliance with the behest of the army offered now the only chance of safety. Accordingly, the Rani, in a palanquin well protected, followed by the Maharaja on a state elephant, with Jowahir Singh in the same houda, attended by the members of the durbar who had not already gone to Mujan Meer, left the fort, and were met without the walls of the city by the four battalions, which turned back, and escorted the procession in silence to the camp, which they did not reach until it was dark. The Rani, her son, and their immediate attendants, were conducted to their tents by the troops. The mahout (driver) of the Maharaja's elephant was ordered to make the animal kneel, and upon his hesitating, a shot, which wounded him in the side, enforced instant compliance. The young Maharaja was taken from the houda, and carried to his mother's tent by some soldiers. The elephant was then made to rise, with Jowahir Singh in the houda, at whom a volley was immediately fired, the effects of which he seems to have escaped. He attempted to parley, pleading for his life, which he had hoped to purchase by the money and bracelets he had brought ; but the soldiers knew that the booty was already theirs, and a second volley hurled him to the ground, where he was cut to pieces. Two of his low associates, Bhyar Chuttur, a door-keeper, and Ruttun Singh, a horse-jockey, with some common sowars, who had been much consulted by the vuzeer on affairs of state, were also put to death. The other members of the durbar of his party were either slain, imprisoned, or fugitives. The Rani and her son were detained in the camp during the night, but were allowed to return to the fort, along with the hostages, in the morning. On passing the spot where her brother's corpse lay hacked and mutilated, she burst into loud lamentations, and was permitted to remove it for cremation. Four wives of Jowahir Singh consented to burn upon the funeral pile of their profligate and brutalized husband, and the barbarous rapacity of the soldiers was exhibited in robbing these wretched victims of their jewels and ornaments. The suttees, whose blessings and curses are deemed alike prophetic, bestowed their benedictions upon the Rani and her party, and their heaviest maledictions upon the Sikh Punt'h, solemnly declaring, before the pile, that, during the present year, the independence of the Sikh nation would cease, the sect be annihilated, the country made desolate, and the wives of the Khalsa troops become widows: a prophecy which made a deep impression upon the superstitious multitude.

After the Dussera (in October), the Rani was declared regent of the state, but all affairs were carried on under the real control of the army punchayets, by whom the precarious and perilous office of the vuzeerat was actually put up to auction. Raja Lal Singh (who, during the late outbreak, had been imprisoned by the troops on the charge of having dishonoured the Rani, "the Mother of all Sikhs," and afterwards released) offered, it is said, fifteen rupees per man; whilst some other competitor tendered eighteen rupees. The troops were most disposed to place the vuzeerat in the hands of Raja Golab Singh, if he would increase their pay and make a liberal donation, and a member of the Jummoo family, named Purthee Singh, who had been deep in the court intrigues, was popular amongst them. Tej Singh, the governor of Peshawur (a nephew of Khooshal Singh), arrived at Lahore, and commenced intrigues on his own account. He was offered the vuzeerat, on the usual terms, which he declined. The Rani, who found the administration burthensome without the aid of some one to share the labour and responsibility, resorted to the expedient (suggested, it is said, by the priests at Amritsur) of deciding the choice in the manner adopted by Runjeet Singh to determine difficult questions, namely, by lot or divination. Five slips of paper were accordingly prepared, two of them blank, and the others bearing the names of Golab Singh, Tej Singh, and Lal Singh. The young Maharaja drew the lot, which fell (by accident or contrivance) upon Lal Singh. But the troops, whose avarice was proof against even superstition, refused to recognize him, and the Rani was unable, out of an exhausted treasury, to bribe them to compliance.

have been roused by the exigency of her circumstances to act with energy and spirit. She laid aside to a great extent her debaucheries, appearing frequently in public, and continued to carry on the government in her own name as regent, consulting alternately Dewan Deena Nath, and Bhae Ram Singh, with her paramour Lal Singh. Her difficulty lay principally with the troops, who, from her inability to feed their rapacity, were on the point of proclaiming the infant son of Sher Singh. In order to turn the thoughts of those turbulent and mercenary men in another direction, the Rani and her party appear to have originated the proposal of a campaign across the Sutluj, which promised them a rich harvest of plunder. The grounds alleged by the Lahore durbar for this sudden determination were four: first, our military preparations; secondly, our non-compliance with a demand for the restitution of certain moneys (amounting to about eighteen lakhs), said to have been deposited by the late Soochet Singh in the treasury at Forozepore; thirdly, the non-restitution, by the Raja of Nabha, of the village of Mowran, which had escheated to him, the escheat having been confirmed by us ; and lastly, the refusal of a claim for the free passage of the Sikh troops into the Khalsa possessions on the British side of the Sutluj.

The events of this brief campaign will form the subject of the next and concluding chapter.

CHAPTER XXV.

CAMPAIGN OF THE SUTLUJ.

THE views and intentions of the general Government of British India, during the whole progress of the transactions before recorded, were of the most forbearing and pacific character. So early as the month of June, 1845, Sir Henry Hardinge declared* that no efforts should be spared to maintain a Sikh government in the Punjab as long as possible, and that, "as a means of averting risk and of carrying our policy more securely into effect," he proposed in October to proceed to the Upper Provinces. In September, and again in the early part of October,† the Governor-General repeated his determination to "maintain a pacific course of policy." The forbearance of our Government, in spite of many provocations, was carried to an unusual extent, and advice and warnings were repeatedly conveyed to the Lahore Government, in the plainest language, even at the risk of giving offence. Precautions were indeed taken, in such a manner as could not justly give umbrage to that government, to provide against the possibility of our being taken unprepared by its army, which had cast off all subordination to legitimate authority; but the Governor-General, down to the beginning of December, continued to be of opinion (with the Commander-in-Chief and the political agent) that the Sikh army would not cross the Sutluj.

Meanwhile, the momentous question of peace or war seems to have engrossed for some time the deliberations of the punchayets, who at length, on the night of the 17th November, called upon their leaders, Tej Singh and Lal Singh, to advance to the Sutluj, pledging themselves to be faithful and obey their orders. This resolution was approved by the durbār. Money was drawn from the sacred depositories at Govind Ghur, and after a solemn meeting of the deputations and the commanders at Runjeet Singh's tomb, the Sikh army, consisting of 60,000 men and 200 cannon, were put in motion towards the British frontier.

Much reliance seems to have been placed upon the efforts made by emissaries to corrupt our sepoys. Sir Henry Hardinge says,* "I have every reason to believe that endeavours have been systematically made, on a very extensive scale, to tamper with our native army; promises of promotion and reward have been liberally made, and their religious prejudices forcibly appealed to." This was the foundation of a vaunt uttered by Lal Singh, that he would bring over the whole army of the English to the Sikhs, and take Ferozepore without fighting. There was also ground for believing that active intrigues had for some time past been employed to induce the chiefs of our protected Sikh territories to rise in arms against the British power as soon as a Sikh army should cross the Sutluj.

The Sikh troops moved on the 24th November, in several divisions; on the 28th, one division had reached Behrana, the others marching in parallel routes; and on the 8th December the whole force had assembled on the banks of the Sutluj (fifty-three miles from Lahore), extending from opposite to Ferozepore, in masses, as far as Huree-keghat. Upon the 11th, 12th, and 13th, the Sikh troops, parties of whom had previously crossed the Sutluj, and carried off some camels, passed the river in large bodies, with guns, on a bridge of boats, about ten miles above Ferozepore.

The Governor-General, in conformity with his determination, set off for the Upper Provinces in October, and in consequence of the reports he received from his agent (Major Broadfoot), he left Delhi on the 19th November, and arrived on the 26th at Kurnaul, where he had an interview with the Commander-in-Chief (Sir Hugh Gough), who, with Major Broadfoot, had come for that purpose from Umbala. Sir Henry reached this place on the 2nd December, and remained there till the 6th, making arrangements for the now inevitable campaign. On his route from Umbala to Ferozepore, he visited Lodia on the 11th, inspecting the troops, which were required, as at other stations, to hold themselves in readiness to move at the shortest notice. Besides his anxiety to give no possible ground of complaint to the Sikh Government, our frontier was too long to be defended on all points by any force we could move, and our two posts on the frontier, Ferozepore and Lodia, were strong enough to be maintained until relieved: at the former was a regiment of Europeans, seven regiments of native infantry, two regiments of native cavalry, and twenty-four field guns, exclusive of heavy ordnance, under Major-General Littler; at Lodia, were one European regiment, five regiments of native infantry, one regiment of native cavalry, and two troops of horse artillery. Even after he was informed that the Sikh army had marched in hostile array towards the Sutluj, Sir Henry declared that he would not consider this as a cause justifying hostilities, unless the frontier was actually violated. "The Lahore Government," he observed, "had as good a right to reinforce their bank of the Sutluj as we to reinforce our posts on that river." Up to the 8th December, no forward movement was, therefore, made from Umbala or Meerut, though the forces in the rear of the latter place were ordered up. The Sikh commanders consequently possessed great advantages in commencing operations.

When the Governor-General heard, on the 8th December, that preparations were making by the Lahore Government upon a large scale for artillery and munitions of war, he directed the Commander-in-Chief to bring up the force from Umbala, Meerut, and other stations in the rear, and considered it no longer prudent to delay the forward movement of the troops, and the whole of the forces destined to move up to the Sutluj were in full march on the 12th. Upon his visit to Lodiana, Sir Henry had inspected the fort and cantonments, and it appeared to him most advisable that the whole of the force at that station (5,000 men and twelve guns) should be marched up with the Umbala force (7,500 men, and thirty-six guns); restricting the defence of Lodiana to the fort, which could be securely garrisoned by the more infirm soldiers, the risk of leaving the town and cantonments to be plundered being less than that of not insuring the strength and sufficiency of the force which might separately be brought into action with the whole of the Sikh army. The joint forces, under Brigadier Wheeler, by a rapid march upon Busseean, where the roads leading from Umbala and Kurnaul meet, formed the advanced column of the army, and secured the supplies at that place.

On the 13th December, the Governor-General received information that the enemy had crossed the Sutluj, when he issued a Proclamation* declaring the views and objects of our Government.

This document sets forth that the British Government had ever been on terms of friendship with that of the Punjab, and had faithfully observed the treaty of amity and concord concluded with Maharaja Runjeet Singh in 1809; that since the death of Sher Singh, the disorganized state of the Lahore Government had made it incumbent on that of British India to adopt precautionary meaasures for the protection of our frontier, which were fully explained to the durbar; that, notwithstanding this condition of the Lahore councils during the last two years, and many most unfriendly proceedings, the British Government had shewn the utmost forbearance, desirous only of seeing a strong government re-established in the Punjab, able to control its army, and protect its subjects; that the Sikh troops had recently marched from Lahore towards the British frontier, by orders of the durbar, to invade the British territory, and no reply was given to repeated demands of the British agent for explanation; that the Sikh army had now, without a shadow of provocation, invaded the British territories, and the Governor-General must, therefore, take measures for protecting the British provinces, and for punishing the violators of treaties and the disturbers of the public peace. The document then declares the possessions of Maharaja Dhuleep Singh on the left, or British, bank of the Sutluj confiscated, and annexed to the British territories.

On the 18th the British forces were concentrated at Moodkee, twenty miles from Ferozepore, with the exception of two European and two native regiments, expected on the following day; the Umbala force having marched 150 miles in six days.

The Sikh corps, which had crossed the Sutluj, after investing Ferozepore on one side, took up an intrenched position at the village of Ferozeshuhur, about ten miles in advance of Ferozepore, and about the same distance from the village of Moodkee. In this camp they had placed 108 pieces of cannon, some of large calibre, with an army exceeding 50,000 men, for the purpose of intercepting the approach of the British force moving up from Umbala to the relief of Ferozepore. On the 18th, the day they had arrived, the British troops, in a state of great exhaustion, were engaged in cooking their meals, when information was received that the Sikh army was in full march to surprise their camp. Sir Hugh Gough pushed forward with the horse artillery and cavalry, directing the infantry and field batteries to follow, and found the enemy in position about two miles off, with from 15,000 to 20,000 infantry, the same number of cavalry, and 40 guns. The country was a dead flat, covered with jungle dotted with sandy hillocks, behind which the enemy screened their infantry and artillery; and whilst our battalions formed into line, opened a very severe cannonade. Our artillery seemed to paralyze theirs, and a flank movement of some of our cavalry turned the left of the Sikhs, and sweeping along the rear of their infantry and guns, silenced the latter for a time, and put their numerous cavalry to flight. The infantry, under Major-Generals Sir H. Smith, Gilbert, and Sir John M'Caskill, then advanced, and attacked in echelon of lines the enemy's infantry, almost invisible amongst the wood and in the approaching darkness. The resistance of the Sikhs was determined; and their line, from superiority of numbers, far outflanked ours; but their whole force was driven from position to position with great slaughter (our infantry using the bayonet), and the loss of seventeen pieces of artillery. Night prevented a pursuit, and the British force bivouacked upon the field for some hours before it returned to its encampment, having no enemy before it. This victory was dearly purchased, Major-General Sir Robert Sale and Major-General Sir John M'Caskill being amongst the killed.

The army halted on the 19th and 20th to refresh the men, and on the 21st, having been joined by the two European regiments and some guns, the Commander-in-Chief, leaving the baggage, wounded, and captured guns at Moodkee, protected by two regiments of native infantry, marched early in the morning against the enemy, who was posted in great force, with a most formidable artillery, four miles on the road to Feroze-shuhur, having been, since the action of the 18th, incessantly employed in intrenching his position. Instead of advancing to the direct attack of these formidable works, our force manœuvred to the right, out of cannon-shot. A communication had been made during the preceding night with Sir John Littler, at Ferozepore, informing him of the intended line of march, and desiring him to move out with such a part of his force as would not endanger their safety or that of the post; and he accordingly left Ferozepore with 5,000 men, two regiments of cavalry, and twenty-one field-guns. The junction of the two forces being effected, Sir Hugh Gough, with the concurrence of the Governor-General, who was present and served as second in command, made arrangements for an attack of the enemy's position. The British force consisted of 16,700 men, and 69 guns, chiefly horse-artillery; the Sikhs, who were commanded in chief by Tej Singh, numbered from 48,000 to 60,000 men, with 108 cannon, of heavy calibre, in fixed batteries.

The enemy's intrenched camp was a parallelogram, about a mile long and half a mile broad, including within its area the strong village of Ferozeshuhur; the shorter sides looking towards the Sutluj and Moodkee, the longer towards Ferozepore and the open country. The attack was directed against the last-named face, the ground in front of which was covered with low jungle. Sir H. Gough conducted the right wing; Sir H. Hardinge the left. The divisions having deployed into line, the artillery in the centre, a heavy cannonade, well directed, was opened by the enemy, which our less numerous and lighter artillery could not silence. In the face of a storm of shot and shells, our infantry advanced, and carried these formidable intrenchments, throwing themselves upon the guns, and wresting them from the enemy. But when the batteries were partially within their grasp, our soldiers had to face such a fire of musketry from the Sikh infantry arrayed behind their guns, that, in spite of heroic efforts, a portion only of the intrenchments could be carried. Night came on whilst the conflict was everywhere raging. Although the division of Sir H. Smith, forming the second line, was brought up, and captured another point of the position, and some of the most formidable batteries were taken by the 3rd light dragoons, yet the enemy remained in possession of a considerable portion of the great quadrangle, whilst our troops, intermingled with the enemy's, kept possession of the remainder, and finally bivouacked upon it, exhausted by their exertions, reduced in numbers, and suffering extremely from thirst.

In this state of things, the night wore away, the enemy continuing to harass our troops by the fire of artillery wherever their position could be discovered. At daylight of the 22nd, our infantry formed line, supported by horse artillery on both flanks, whilst a fire was opened from our centre by such heavy guns as remained effective. A masked battery played with great effect upon this point, dismounting our pieces and blowing up our tumbrils. At this moment, the two commanders (Sir H. Gough and Sir H. Hardinge) placed themselves at the head of their respective wings; the line advanced, unchecked by the enemy's fire; drove the Sikhs rapidly out of the village of Ferozeshuhur and their encampment; then, changing front to its left on its centre, continued to sweep the camp, bearing down all opposition, and dislodged the enemy from his whole position. The line then halted, as on a day of manœuvre, being masters of the field, of seventy-three pieces of cannon, and the standards of the Khalsa army.

The toils and glories of the victors were, however, not yet over. In the course of two hours, Tej Singh (who had commanded in this great battle) brought up from the vicinity of Ferozepore fresh battalions and a large field of artillery, supported by 30,000 Ghorepurras, hitherto encamped near the river, with which he made three several attempts to retake the position, which were repelled by our exhausted troops, our artillery, the ammunition having been expended, being unable to fire a single shot. The Sikhs suffered greatly, their camp being the scene of a most terrible carnage. Our loss was very severe, Brigadier Wallace (who succeeded Major-General McCaskill), and Major Broadfoot, the political agent, being amongst the killed. The captured camp was found to be protected by charged mines, by the successive springing of which many officers and men were destroyed. Sir H. Hardinge's general staff were all disabled, with the single exception of his son, Captain Hardinge.

The result of the battle of Ferozeshuhur, which is considered to be the severest ever fought in India, and one of the most honourable to the British arms in that country, was, that the Sikhs, disheartened by the loss of nearly all their artillery, retired in confusion upon the fords of the Sutluj.

Tej Singh, the commander of the Sikh forces, came to the British camp and had an interview with the Governor-General, who refused to enter into any negotiations until the British troops should be under the walls of Lahore.

On the 31st December, the Governor-General issued a Proclamation,* which, after stating that the Lahore government had, without provocation, or any declaration of hostilities, and notwithstanding a treaty of amity and alliance, invaded the British territory by a large Sikh army, which had been driven across the Sutluj with the loss of ninety pieces of artillery, it had become necessary for the British Government to take measures for punishing this aggression and for preventing similar acts of treachery. It called upon all natives of Hindustan, who had taken service under the Lahore government, to place themselves under the orders of the British Government, on pain of forfeiting all claim to British protection, and being treated as traitors to their country and enemies of the British Government.

The enemy made a further effort upon the Upper Sutluj. Pressed for supplies upon his own bank of the river, he strove to draw them from the jagir estates on the southern bank. At Dhermkote, about forty miles to the westward of Lodiana, where there was a depôt of grain, the Sikhs had a small garrison of mercenaries, and on the 18th January Major-General Sir H. Smith was sent against this place, with a single brigade of his division, and a light field battery. He easily effected its reduction; but whilst he was yet in march, the Commander-in-Chief received information that Runjoor Singh, Majethia (brother of Lena Singh), had crossed the Sutluj at Philor, the route to Lodiana, at the head of a numerous force, and established himself in position at Baran Hara, between the old and new courses of the Sutluj; not only threatening Lodiana, but indicating a determination to intersect the line of our communications at Basseean and Rajkote.

Major-General Smith was upon this directed to advance with his brigade and Brigadier Cureton's cavalry from Dhermkote, by Jugraon, towards Lodiana, and his second brigade under Brigadier Wheeler, moved on to support him. The combinations became now very delicate and important, it being necessary to guard the whole frontier from Roopur down to Mundote. Upon the Major-General advancing from Jugraon, Runjoor Singh, relying on the superiority of his force, endeavoured to intercept his progress, by marching in a line parallel to him and opening a furious cannonade. Sir H. Smith continued, however, to advance, and when the Sikh general, bending round one wing of his army, enveloped his flank, extricated himself by retiring with great steadiness and regularity, and effected his communication with Lodiana, but not without severe loss. Sir H. Smith was now strengthened by the force under Brigadier Godby at Lodiana, consisting of three native regiments, whilst reinforcements were gradually coming up, including the 53rd regiment of foot: but, on the other hand, his manceuvres had thrown him out of communication with Brigadier Wheeler, and a portion of his baggage had fallen into the hands of the enemy. The Sikh general had strongly intrenched himself at Budhowal; but threatened on either flank by General Smith and Brigadier Wheeler, he decamped in the night of the 22nd, and moved down towards the ford of Tulwun (being cut off from that of Philor), the British troops occupying his abandoned position at Budhowal. Having been joined by Brigadier Wheeler on the 26th, as well as by the 53rd regiment and the Shekhawuttee brigade, Sir H. Smith prepared to attack the sirdar on his new ground, where he was also strongly intrenched; but Runjoor Singh having been reinforced on the 27th, from the right bank of the river, with 4,000 regular troops (Avitabili's), twelve pieces of artillery, and a large body of cavalry, advanced towards Jugraon, apparently with the view of intercepting our communications by that route. Sir H. Smith marched at daylight on the 28th. Having proceeded about six miles, the enemy was observed in motion, directly opposite the front of the British army, on a ridge, of which the village of Aliwal was the centre. His left appeared still to occupy its ground in the circular intrenchment he had formed (his flanks resting on the river); his right was brought forward and occupied the ridge. The general directed the necessary movements, which were performed with the celerity and precision of the most correct field-day. Upon the line advancing in order of battle, the enemy opened a fierce cannonade. The British line was halted for a few moments, though under fire, till the brigades on the right were brought up, when a rapid charge was made and the village was carried. The line again advanced, European and native troops contending for the front, and the battle became general. The British cavalry on the right drove the enemy's upon their infantry; and his left flank was forced back, and some guns taken. While these operations were going forward on the right, the British left was pressing the Ayeen troops, called Avitabili's. Being well driven back on his left centre, the enemy endeavoured to hold his right, to cover the passage of the river, and he strongly occupied the village of Bhoondi, but this was carried by the bayonet. Repeated charges were made upon the flying infantry, and upon the bodies that attempted to make a stand, and the destruction was very great. Our troops kept advancing with the most perfect order to the common focus—the passage of the river. The Sikhs, completely hemmed in, were precipitating themselves in disordered masses into the ford and boats, in the utmost confusion and consternation; and the wreck of their army appeared upon the opposite high bank of the river, flying in every direction. Every gun the enemy had (fifty-seven in number) fell into the hands of the victors, or was spiked or sunk in the river; all his baggage, ammunition, and stores were abandoned. The Sikhs fought with much resolution, maintaining frequent rencontres with our cavalry hand to hand. In one charge of infantry upon the 16th Lancers, they threw away their muskets, and came on with their swords and targets against the lance. Our loss, though comparatively small, was severe.

risons of all the forts hitherto occupied on the British side of the Sutluj, and the submission of the whole of the territory on the left bank of that river to the British Government.

Though defeated on the Upper Sutluj, and disheartened by the spectacle of the numerous corpses that floated from thence to the bridge of boats at Sobraon, the enemy continued to hold his position on the right bank, and the formidable tête de pont and intrenchments on the left bank of the river, in front of the main body of our army. These works had been repeatedly reconnoitred, and observation, with the reports of spies, led to the conclusion that they held not fewer than 30,000 of the best Khalsa troops, with seventy pieces of cannon, united by a good bridge to a reserve on the opposite bank, where the enemy had a considerable camp and some artillery, commanding and flanking his field-works on the British side.

The Commander-in-Chief was not in a state to attack this intrenched position until the troops under Major-General Sir H.

Smith should have rejoined his camp, and the siege-train and ammunition should have arrived from Delhi. The first portion of the siege-train reached the camp on the 7th and 8th February; and on the latter day, the brigades which had been detached from the main army, for the operations in the neighbourhood of Lodiana, rejoined it. On the 10th, the Commander-in-Chief resolved (with the approbation of the Governor-General) to undertake the arduous task of attacking these strong works. The British troops took possession, without opposition, of two forts, at Kodeewala and the Little Sobraon. The battering and field artillery was then put in position in an extended semicircle, embracing within its fire the works of the Sikhs. On the margin of the Sutluj, on the British left, two brigades of Major-General Dick's division, under his command, stood ready to commence the assault against the enemy's extreme right. In reserve was another brigade, to move forward from the intrenched village of Kodeewala. In the centre, Major-General Gilbert's division was deployed for support or attack, its right resting on and in the village of the Little Sobraon. Major-General Sir H. Smith's division was formed near the village of Guttah, with its right towards the Sutluj. Brigadier Cureton's cavalry threatened the ford at Huree, and the enemy's horse under Raja Lal Singh, on the opposite bank. The rest of the cavalry, under Major-General Sir J. Thackwell, was held in reserve.

Our batteries opened shortly after day-break, but, though spirited and well directed, their fire could not silence that of seventy pieces behind well-constructed batteries of earth, plank, and fascines, or dislodge troops covered by redoubts or epaulments, or within a triple line of trenches. At nine o'clock, Brigadier Stacey's brigade (belonging to General Dick's division), supported by artillery, moved to the attack; but so hot was the fire, that it seemed for some moments impossible that the intrenchments could be won under it. Perseverance, however, triumphed, and the army had the satisfaction of seeing Brigadier Stacey's troops driving the Sikhs in confusion before them within the area of their encampment. As it was soon found that the weight of the whole force within the Sikh camp was likely to be thrown upon the two brigades that had passed its trenches, it became necessary to convert into close attacks the demonstrations of the centre and right, and the battle raged with inconceivable fury from right to left. The Sikhs; even when, at particular points, their intrenchments were mastered with the bayonet, strove to regain them by the fiercest conflict, sword in hand; nor was it until the cavalry of the left had moved forward and ridden through the openings of the intrenchments made by our sappers, in single file, and reformed as they passed them, and the 3rd Dragoons had on this day, as at Ferozeshuhur, galloped over and cut down the defenders of batteries and field-works, and until the full weight of three divisions of infantry, with every field artillery gun which could be sent to their aid, had been cast into the scale, that victory finally declared for the British. The fire of the Sikhs first slackened and then nearly ceased, and the victors then, pressing them on every side, precipitated them in masses over the bridge, and into the Sutluj, which a sudden rise of seven inches had rendered hardly fordable. In their efforts to reach the right bank, through the deepened water, they suffered from our horse artillery a terrible carnage. Hundreds fell under this cannonade; hundreds upon hundreds were drowned in attempting the perilous passage. "Their awful slaughter, confusion, and dismay," observes Sir H. Gough, "were such as would have excited compassion in the hearts of their generous conquerors, if the Khalsa troops had not, in the early part of the action, sullied their gallantry by slaughtering and barbarously mangling every wounded soldier whom, in the vicissitudes of attack, the fortune of war left at their mercy."

The victory of Sobraon placed in the hands of the British 67 more pieces of cannon, upwards of 200 camel-swivels, numerous standards and munitions of war. Our loss was severe, including Major-General Dick, who was mortally wounded. The loss of the Sikhs was immense, not fewer than 8,000 being killed, wounded, or drowned.

Amongst the slain were Sham Singh, Ata-reewala, and five or six other sirdars; and amongst the wounded, Tej Singh, who commanded in chief.

The British army now prepared to pass the Sutluj. During the night of the 10th, on which the victory was achieved, the advanced brigades of the British army were thrown across the river. Early on the 12th the bridge was completed, and on the 13th the whole force (excepting the heavy train and the division left to bring in the wounded and the captured guns) was encamped in the Punjab, at Kasoor (sixteen miles from the bank of the river, and thirty-two miles from Lahore), where the Governor-General joined the camp of the Commander-in-Chief on the morning of the 14th. On the same day, he issued a Proclamation,* declaring that the occupation of the Punjab by the British forces would not be relinquished until ample atonement should have been made for the infraction of the treaty, and the unprovoked invasion of the British provinces, including full indemnity for all expenses incurred during the war, and such arrangements for the future government of the Lahore territories as would give perfect security against similar acts of perfidy and aggression; that no extension of territory was desired by the Government of India, though the measures necessary for providing indemnity and security would involve the retention by it of a portion of the Lahore territories, the extent of which would be determined by the conduct of the durbar, and by considerations for the protection of the British frontier; that the Government of India would, under any circumstances, annex to the British provinces the districts, hill and plain, situated between the Sutluj and Beas, the revenues being appropriated as a part of the indemnity required from the Lahore state; that although the conduct of the durbar had been such as to justify the most severe and extreme measures of retribution, the Governor-General, nevertheless, was still willing that an opportunity should be afforded to the durbar and the chiefs to submit to the British Government, and by a return to good faith and the observance of prudent counsels, enable the Governor-General to organize a Sikh rule in the person of a descendant of its founder, the late Runjeet Singh, the faithful ally of the British power. The Proclamation, therefore, called upon the Sikh chiefs to act in concert with the Governor-General for carrying into effect such arrangements as would maintain a Sikh government at Lahore, capable of controlling its army and protecting its subjects, and based upon principles that would provide for the future tranquillity of the Sikh states, secure the British frontier against aggression, and prove to the whole world the moderation and justice of the paramount power of India. The document concludes with declaring that, if this opportunity of rescuing the Sikh nation from military anarchy and misrule were neglected, and hostilities renewed, the Indian Government would make such other arrangements for the future government of the Punjab as the interests and security of the British power might render just and expedient.

When the news of the victory at Sobraon reached Lahore, the Rani and durbar urged Raja Golab Singh to proceed immediately to the British camp, to beg pardon in the name of the Sikh Government, and endeavour to negotiate some arrangement. Before he undertook this mission, the raja stipulated that the durbar, the chief officers, and the punchayets of the army should sign a solemn declaration that they would abide by such terms as he might obtain from the British Government. This was immediately acceded to, and on the 15th Raja Golab Singh, Dewan Deena Nath, and Fakir Noor-ud-deen arrived in the Governor-General's camp* at Kasoor, with full credentials, empowered to agree, in the name of the Maharaja and the government, to such terms as the Governor-General might dictate. Sir H. Hardinge received the raja (who was accompanied by the Barukzye chief, Sooltan Mahomed Khan, and several of the most influential sirdars) in durbar, as the representative of an offending government, omitting the forms observed on the occasion of friendly meetings, and refusing the proffered nuzzurs and complimentary offerings. He briefly explained to the raja and his colleagues the serious nature of the offence and the unwarrantable conduct of the chiefs and army; observing that he recognized the wisdom, prudence, and good feeling evinced by the raja, in having kept himself separate from the unjustifiable hostilities of the Sikhs, and was prepared to mark his sense of that conduct, and he referred the chiefs to Mr. Currie, the chief secretary to Government, and Major Lawrence, the agent to the Governor-General, that they might learn from them the principles and details of adjustment which he had determined to offer for their immediate acceptance.

The chiefs remained the greater part of the night in conference with Mr. Currie and Major Lawrence, and, before they separated, a paper was signed by them, conceding all the demands. These were, the surrender, in full sovereignty, of the territory, hill and plain, lying between the Sutluj and Beas rivers; the payment of one crore and a half of rupees, as indemnity for the expenses of the war; the disbandment of the present Sikh army, and its re-organization under the system and regulations with regard to pay which existed in the time of Runjeet Singh; the arrangement for limiting the extent of the force which might be henceforth employed to be determined on in communication with the British Government; the surrender of all the guns that had been pointed against us; the entire regulation and control of both banks of the river Sutluj, to be ceded to us, and such other arrangements for settling the future boundaries of the Sikh state, and the organization of its administration, as might be determined on at Lahore. It was further arranged that the Maharaja, with Bhae Ram Singh, and the other chiefs remaining at Lahore, should forthwith repair to the camp of the Governor-General, and place themselves in his hands, and that they should accompany his camp to Lahore.

It was determined that the Maharaja should meet the Governor-General at Lulleana (eleven miles in advance of Kasoor, and nearly mid-way between the Sutluj and Lahore) on the 18th; but before the arrival of the camp at Lulleana, the Governor-General learned that the Maharaja, with Bhae Ram Singh and other chiefs, had hastened from Lahore, and that his highness was ready at once to wait upon him. Sir Henry considered it right to abide by the first arrangement, and declared he would receive his highness, on the day appointed, at Lulleana. Accordingly, on the afternoon of the 18th February, the Maharaja, attended by Raja Golab Singh, Dewan Deena Nath, Fakir Noor-ud-deen, Bhae Ram Singh, and ten or twelve other chiefs, had an interview with the Governor-General in his durbar-tent, the Commander-in-Chief and staff being present. The usual salute to the Maharaja was omitted, and the other customary ceremonies on his arrival at the tent were curtailed, Sir Henry causing it to be explained that, until submission had been distinctly tendered by the Maharaja in person, he could not be recognized and received as a friendly prince. Submission was accordingly tendered by the minister and chiefs who accompanied the Maharaja, and the pardon and clemency of the British Government were requested, on such conditions as Sir Henry should dictate, in the most explicit terms. Sir Henry stated that the conditions having been distinctly made known to the minister, Raja Golab Singh, and the chiefs accredited with him, it was unnecessary to discuss them in that place, and in the presence of the young Maharaja, who was of too tender an age to take part in such matters, and that, as all the requirements of the British Government had been acquiesced in, and their fulfilment promised in the name of the Maharaja and durbar, he should consider himself justified in treating the young Maharaja from that moment as a prince restored to the friendship of the British Government, which extended its clemency to a prince, the descendant of one who had for so many years been the faithful ally and friend of the British Government, as the representative of the Sikh nation, selected by the chiefs and the people to be their ruler, on the condition that all the terms imposed by the British Government, and previously explained to his high-

After some remarks regarding the character of the late Maharaja Runjeet Singh, and a hope expressed that the young prince would follow the footsteps of his father, and that such relations should henceforward exist between the two states as would tend to the benefit of both, the Governor-General broke up the durbar. On his taking leave, the customary presents were made to the Maharaja; and, on his retiring from the tent, the usual salute was fired.

In the course of discussion, the minister asked if the young Maharaja should now return to the Rani at Lahore, or remain at the British camp; intimating that it was for Sir Henry to dispose of the young chief as he pleased, and as he might consider best for his highness's interests. Sir Henry replied, that he thought it advisable that his highness's camp should accompany him, and that he should himself conduct him to his capital.

The inhabitants of Lahore and Amritsur being in great alarm at the approach of the British army, apprehending that those cities might be sacked and plundered, the Governor-General issued a Proclamation* to the chiefs, merchants, traders, ryuts, and other inhabitants, informing them of the result of the interview with the Maharaja, and assuring them of protection, in person and property, if the durbar acted in good faith, and no further hostile opposition was offered by the army.

Meanwhile, the remains of the Sikh army (from 14,000 to 20,000 horse and foot, with about thirty-five guns), under Tej Singh and Raja Lal Singh, on retiring from Sobraon, had encamped at Raeban, about eighteen miles east of Lahore. They had been positively ordered by Raja Golab Singh to remain stationary; and the Mahomedan and Nujeeb battalions, in the interest of the minister, had been placed in the citadel and at the gates of Lahore, with strict orders to permit no armed Sikh soldier to enter the town.

On the morning of the 20th, the British army appeared in sight of Lahore, and about noon pitched its tents on the plain of Mujan Meer, under the walls of the Sikh capital, without opposition. On the same afternoon, the Maharaja was escorted to his palace in the citadel. The escort consisted of two regiments of European cavalry, two regiments of native cavalry, one regiment of irregular horse, and two troops of horse artillery, all under the command of Brigadier Cureton. The secretary of the government (Mr. Currie) took charge of his highness and suite, accompanied by the political agent (Major Lawrence), the Governor-General's private secretary (Mr. C. Hardinge), and various other functionaries. About three-quarters of a mile from the Maharaja's camp, it was met by Raja Golab Singh and some of the chiefs. On reaching his highness's camp, the troops of the escort drew up, and the Maharaja, with Bhae Ram Singh on the same elephant, came forward from his tent, accompanied by several chiefs; and after the customary compliments, the procession, headed by the Maharaja and Mr. Currie on their elephants, side by side, moved round the walls of the city to the gate of the citadel, when the escort drew up in front of the gateway, and Mr. Currie, attended by the officers of the escort, and Raja Golab Singh and the other chiefs, took the Maharaja into the interior of the citadel, and to the inner door of the palace. Mr. Currie then observed to his highness and the chiefs, that, by order of the Governor-General, he had thus brought the Maharaja, conducted by the British army, to his palace, which he had left for the purpose of tendering submission to the British Government, and for placing himself, his capital, and his country, at the mercy of the Governor-General, and requesting pardon for the insult that had been offered; and that the Governor-General had thus restored him to his palace, as a mark of the favour which he desired to shew to the descendant of the late Maharaja Runjeet Singh. A salute of twenty-one guns was then fired by the horse artillery. The escort then took leave of the Maharaja at the gate of his palace, and returning to the outside of the city, continuing its progress round Lahore, returned to the camp, situated opposite the south-east end of the city face, the citadel

* Lahore, once an imperial city, rival of Delhi, has fallen from its former magnificence ; judging from its ruins, which are scattered over a large extent, Lahore is not one-tenth the size it was. It is surrounded by a strong and handsome brick wall, thirty-five feet high, with circular towers and angular bastions, inclosing some new ground, forming a sweep of about seven miles. The wall throughout the greater part of its extent is fronted by a fausse-braye, and a deep ditch, with a counterscarp of twenty feet. There are twelve gates, each having a double entrance. The fort or citadel is at the N.W. angle of the city. The interior of Lahore presents a strange confusion of majestic buildings, intermixed with ruins, rubbish, and wretched huts. Close to the palace are mounds of dirt, crumbled mud walls, and heaps of stone. The houses are two or three stories high, built of brick, with flat roofs, and generally ornamented with carved wooden balconies: they have a mean appearance, and look gloomy, being inclosed with dead walls. The streets are very narrow, dirty, and, in wet weather, a perfect slough ; the main street is only thirteen feet wide and very filthy: they are crowded with people, showily dressed in silks of every colour. Very strong moveable awnings project over the shops and nearly occupy the entire breadth of the narrow crooked roadway. Stuffs hung out to dry, carts with oxen, horsemen, camels, elephants make a motley scene, whilst on the finely-carved balconies the wealthy banyans, with painted faces and red turbans, present their

On the morning of the 22nd, Sir Hugh Gough conducted a brigade of British troops into the city, which took formal possession of the Badshahi Musjid,* and the Hazari Bagh,† forming a part of the palace, and their low obeisances, or some of the dark beauties of the place salute the passer-by with "Salaam, Maharaja!" The population has been variously estimated at from 80,000 to 120,000.

* The Badshahi Musjid (or Mosque), built by Aurangzebe, is a magnificent edifice, massive, simple, and of beautiful proportions. It is constructed of red free-stone, inlaid with white marble, the mosque itself being surmounted by three large marble domes, crowned with gilt spires. The principal gateway leads into a court 580 feet square. The lofty minarets, 150 feet high, at the angles, elegantly proportioned, are described as "complete works of art."—Barr, p. 96.

† The Hazari Bagh, formerly the residence of the Mogul emperors, consists of three large quadrangles; the first, 500 paces long, is surrounded by vaulted buildings, now used as magazines. The western side is occupied by the Badshahi Musjid. This quadrangle leads to the garden court, likewise surrounded by vaulted open halls, with a pavilion of white marble in the centre. A ponderous gate admits to the third quadrangle, or citadel, which is surrounded by numerous buildings, among which is the winter-palace of the Maharaja, on its northern side, with a winding staircase rising above the highest platform.—Von Orlich, vol. i. p. 213.

the gateway of the citadel of Lahore. The remaining part of the citadel was the residence of the Maharaja and of the families of the late Runjeet Singh: no troops were, therefore, posted within the precincts of the palace gate.

On the 8th March, a conference was held between Mr. Currie and Major Lawrence, on the one part, and Bhae Ram Singh, Raja Lal Singh, Sirdar Tej Singh, Dewan Deena Nath, and Fakir Noor-ud-deen, on the other, at the tent of the Governor-General's agent, for the purpose of signing the treaty. The minister and chiefs produced, on the part of the Maharaja, a letter addressed to Major Lawrence, acknowledging the consideration, kindness, and generosity which had been evinced by the Governor-General towards the Lahore state, and expressing a desire that, as the government was endeavouring to arrange its affairs, and it was necessary that effectual measures should be taken to prevent the recurrence of any disturbances, some British regiments, with artillery and officers, should remain at Lahore for a few months, for the protection of the state. It was observed in reply that, from the wording of the letter, it was not evident that the retention of a British force at Lahore was sincerely and urgently desired by the government, and the nature of the disturbances to be provided against were not specifically described; and as the British Government desired to exercise no interference with the government of Lahore after the treaty of peace was concluded, if for any special reason its assistance and intervention were desired by the durbar, the fact and causes should have been more distinctly stated. A formal khureeta, or official communication,* bearing the seal of the Maharaja, was thereupon sent to the Governor-General, urging the request in more distinct and explicit terms, and the Governor-General determined that a British force should, under certain conditions, to be entered in a separate engagement, occupy Lahore for a limited time. The treaty was then signed by the commissioners, and the meeting broke up.

On the following afternoon, the treaty was ratified by the Governor-General, in his state-tent, in the presence of the Maharaja and the Sikh chiefs, and of the Commander-in-Chief and staff, the Governor of Scinde (Sir Charles Napier) and staff, the generals of division, the brigadiers, the head of each department, and all officers commanding corps, with one native officer from every British regiment.

The young Maharaja, attended by the minister, Lal Singh, Raja Golab Singh, Sirdar Tej Singh, and about thirty other sirdars and civil officers being present, the treaty of peace was ratified and exchanged, and the Governor-General then addressed the chiefs, his address being translated, sentence by sentence, by Mr. Currie. In this address, Sir Henry repeated his desire that peace and friendship might always subsist between the two governments, and that a Sikh government might be re-established, that could control its army, protect its subjects, and respect the rights of its neighbours. He recommended the policy of Runjeet Singh towards the British Government as the model for their future imitation ; and enforced " wisdom in council, and good faith in fulfilling engagements." He declared, that the British Government had no objects of aggrandizement by hostilities, and did not desire to interfere in their internal affairs; that he had reluctantly consented, at the earnest solicitation of the durbar, to leave a British force in garrison at Lahore, until the Sikh army was reorganized according to the treaty, but in no case should it remain longer than the end of this year. If, he observed, the friendly assistance now afforded by the British Government were wisely followed up by honest exertions, the state might prosper, and his co-operation should not be wanting; but if they neglected this opportunity, no aid on the part of the British Government could save the state.

At the close of this address, the sirdars expressed in warm terms their gratitude to the Governor-General, and their resolution to follow the advice his Excellency had given them.

By this treaty,* the Maharaja renounces all claim to, or connection with, the territories to the south of the Sutluj, and cedes to the East-India Company the whole doab between the Beas and Sutluj. His Highness being unable to pay, or give security for the eventual payment of, a crore and a half of rupees (about £1,500,000), as indemnification of the expenses of the war, he cedes to the Company, as an equivalent for one crore, his possessions in the hill countries between the Beas and the Indus, including the provinces of Cashmere and Hazara, engaging to pay the remaining fifty lacs on or before the ratification of the treaty. He engages to disband the mutinous troops, and to reorganize the regular or Ayeen regiments of infantry, upon the system, and according to the regulations as to pay, observed in the time of Runjeet Singh. The regular army of Lahore is not to exceed 20,000 infantry and 12,000 cavalry, and the guns, thirty-six in number, which had been pointed against the British troops on the right bank of the Sutluj, are to be surrendered. The control of the rivers Beas and Sutluj, with the Ghara and Punjnud, to the confluence with the Indus at Mittunkote, and from Mittunkote to the borders of Baloochistan, is, with respect to tolls, to rest with the British Government. Free passage is allowed to the British troops through the Lahore territories, and no European or American is to be employed by the Lahore government without the sanction of the British. In consideration of his services, Raja Golab Singh is to be recognized as an independent sovereign in the territories which the British may make over to him. All changes in the frontiers of the Lahore state are prohibited, and all its disputes are to be referred to the British Government, which is not to interfere in its internal administration.

On the 10th March, the Governor-General paid a state visit to the Maharaja in his palace, when Dewan Deena Nath, by direction of the minister and assembled chiefs, read an address expressing the gratitude they felt for the generosity, kindness, and mercy of the Governor-General, in maintaining the government, for his excellent advice given to the sirdars the day before, and for leaving a garrison of British troops in Lahore, in compliance with their solicitations.

The following day, articles of agreement* were concluded between the British Government and the Lahore durbar, with reference to the retention of the British garrison at Lahore; and on the 16th March, a treaty† was concluded at Amritsur, between the British Government and "Maharaja" Golab Singh, by which the former made over to him all the hilly country situated to the eastward of the Indus and westward of the Ravi, including Chumba, and excluding Lahoul, being part of the territory ceded by the Lahore state to the British Government; Maharaja Golab Singh stipulating to pay to the British Government seventy-five lakhs of rupees, and to acknowledge its supremacy, in token of which he engages to present annually to it one horse, twelve shawl goats, and three pairs of Cashmere shawls.

The kingdom of the Punjab has, therefore, ceased to exist, and has now become the state of Lahore.

Thus terminated a contest which, in its origin, incidents, and consequences, has few parallels in the military annals of any nation.

Sudden and unprovoked, it was brought to a rapid and glorious close by one short and brilliant campaign, in which the enemy, possessing all the advantages of opportunity, numbers, and discipline, directed by skill and backed by desperate resolution, was overwhelmed, and a powerful kingdom was laid prostrate at the feet of its conquerors, whose forbearance, when all was in their power, suffered them to exact "nothing more from the vanquished than was necessary for the maintenance of peace and security against violence and rapine."*

APPENDIX.

No. I.

THE British Government has ever been on terms of friendship with that of the Punjab.

In the year 1809 a treaty of amity and concord was concluded between the British Government and the late Maharaja Runjeet Singh, the conditions of which have always been faithfully observed by the British Government, and were scrupulously fulfilled by the late Maharaja.

The same friendly relations have been maintained with the successors of Maharaja Runjeet Singh by the British Government up to the present time.

Since the death of the late Maharaja Sher Singh, the disorganized state of the Lahore government has made it incumbent on the Governor-General in Council to adopt precautionary measures for the protection of the British frontier; the nature of these measures, and the cause of their adoption, were at the time fully explained to the Lahore durbar.

Notwithstanding the disorganized state of the Lahore government during the last two years, and many most unfriendly proceedings on the part of the durbar, the Governor-General in Council has continued to evince his desire to maintain the relations of amity and concord which had so long existed between the two states, for the mutual interests and happiness of both. He has shewn on every occasion the utmost forbearance, from consideration to the helpless state of the infant Maharaja Dhuleep Singh, whom the British Government had recognized as the successor to the late Maharaja Sher Singh.

The Governor-General in Council sincerely desired to see a strong Sikh government re-established in the Punjab, able to control its army and to protect its subjects. He had not, up to the present moment, abandoned the hope of seeing that important object effected by the patriotic efforts of the Sikhs and people of that country.

The Sikh army recently marched from Lahore towards the British frontier, as it was alleged, by the orders of the durbar, for the purpose of invading the British territory.

The Governor-General's agent, by direction of the Governor-General, demanded an explanation of this movement, and no reply being returned within a reasonable time, the demand was repeated. The Governor-General, unwilling to believe in the hostile intentions of the Sikh government, to which no provocation had been given, refrained from taking any measures which might have a tendency to embarrass the government of the Maharaja, or to induce collision between the two states.

When no reply was given to the repeated demand for explanation, and while active military preparations were continued at Lahore, the Governor-General considered it necessary to order the advance of troops towards the frontier, to reinforce the frontier posts.

The Sikh army has now, without a shadow of provocation, invaded the British territories.

The Governor-General must, therefore, take measures for effectually protecting the British provinces, for vindicating the authority of the British Government, and for punishing the violators of treaties and the disturbers of the public peace.

The Governor-General hereby declares the possessions of Maharaja Dhuleep Singh on the left or British

The Governor-General will respect the existing rights of all jaghirdars, zemindars, and tenants in the said possessions, who, by the course they now pursue, evince their fidelity to the British Government.

The Governor-General hereby calls upon all the chiefs and sirdars in the protected territories to co-operate cordially with the British Government for the punishment of the common enemy, and for the maintenance of order in these states. Those of the chiefs who shew alacrity and fidelity in the discharge of this duty which they owe to the protecting power, will find their interests promoted thereby, and those who take a contrary course will be treated as enemies to the British Government, and will be punished accordingly.

The inhabitants of all the territories on the left bank of the Sutluj are hereby directed to abide peaceably in their respective villages, where they will receive efficient protection by the British Government. All parties of men found in armed bands, who can give no satisfactory account of their proceedings, will be treated as disturbers of the public peace.

All subjects of the British Government, and those who possess estates on both sides the river Sutluj, who, by their faithful adherence to the British Government, may be liable to sustain loss, shall be indemnified and secured in all their just rights and privileges.

On the other hand, all subjects of the British Government who shall continue in the service of the Lahore state, and who disobey this proclamation by not immediately returning to their allegiance, will be liable to have their property on this side the Sutluj confiscated, and declared to be aliens and enemies of the British Government.

No. II.

Proclamation by the Right Hon. the Governor-General of India.

Foreign Department, Ferozepore,
Dec. 31, 1845.

The Lahore government has, without provocation, or any declaration of hostilities, and notwithstanding the existence of a treaty of amity and alliance, made war upon the British Government. A large Sikh army has invaded the British territories, which has been repulsed and driven across the Sutluj with the loss of ninety-one pieces of their artillery, now in our possession. It becomes necessary, therefore, for the British Government to take measures for punishing this unprovoked aggression, and for preventing in future similar acts of treachery by the government and army of the Punjab. The British Government considers it right now to call upon all natives and inhabitants of Hindostan who have taken service under the Lahore government, to quit that service, and place themselves under the orders of the Governor-General of India. As long as relations of amity existed between the two states, there was no objection to the natives of the one territory taking service with the government of the other; but now that the Lahore state has become the avowed enemy of the Government of Hindostan, it is incumbent on all natives of Hindostan, whose homes and families are under British protection, to quit the service of the common enemy, and join that of the Government of their own country. All persons of the above description are, therefore, hereby called upon to repair to the British side of the Sutluj and to report themselves to the British authorities; their interests will in all cases be respected; they will, if fit for the military service, be taken into that of the British Government, with all the advantages of pay and allowances enjoyed by British soldiers.

All natives of Hindostan who, after the promulgation of this proclamation, continue in the service of the enemy, will be considered to have forfeited all claim to British protection, and will be treated as traitors to their country and enemies of the British Government.

By order of the Right Hon. the Governor-General of India.

No. III.

Proclamation by the Right Hon. the Governor-General of India.

Foreign Department, Kussoor,
Feb. 14, 1846.

The Sikh army has been expelled from the left bank of the river Sutluj, having been defeated in every action, with the loss of more than 220 pieces of field artillery.

The British army has crossed the Sutluj, and entered the Punjab.

The Governor-General announces by this proclamation that this measure has been adopted by the Government of India, in accordance with the intentions expressed in the proclamation of the 13th of December last, as having been forced upon the Governor-General, for the purpose of "effectually protecting the British provinces, for vindicating the authority of the British Government, and for punishing the violators of treaties and the disturbers of the public peace."

These operations will be steadily persevered in and vigorously prosecuted, until the objects proposed to be accomplished are fully attained. The occupation of the Punjab by the British forces will not be relinquished until ample atonement for the insult offered to the British Government by the infraction of the treaty of 1809 A.D., and by the unprovoked invasion of the British provinces, shall have been exacted. These objects will include full indemnity for all expenses incurred during the war, and such arrangements for the future government of the Lahore territories as will give perfect security to the British Government against similar acts of perfidy and aggression.

Military operations against the government and army of the Lahore state have not been undertaken by the Government of India from any desire of territorial aggrandizement. The Governor-General, as already announced in the proclamation of the 13th of December, "sincerely desired to see a strong Sikh government re-established in the Punjab, able to control its army and to protect its subjects." The sincerity of these professions is proved by the fact that no preparations for hostilities had been made when the Lahore government suddenly, and without a pretext of complaint, invaded the British territories. The unprovoked aggression has compelled the British Government to have recourse to arms, and to organize the means of offensive warfare, and whatever may now befall the Lahore state, the consequences can alone be attributed to the misconduct of that government and its army.

No extension of territory was desired by the Government of India; the measures necessary for providing indemnity for the past and security for the future will, however, involve the retention by the British Government of a portion of the country hitherto under the government of the Lahore state. The extent of territory which it may be deemed advisable to hold will be determined by the conduct of the durbar, and by considerations for the security of the British frontier. The Government of India will, under any circumstances, annex to the British provinces the districts, hill and plain, situated between the rivers Sutluj and Beas, the revenues thereof being appropriated as a part of the indemnity required from the Lahore state.

The Government of India has frequently declared that it did not desire to subvert the Sikh government in the Punjab; and although the conduct of the durbar has been such as to justify the most severe and extreme measures of retribution (the infliction of which may yet be required by sound policy, if the recent acts of violence be not amply atoned for, and immediate submission tendered), nevertheless the Governor-General is still willing that an opportunity should be given to the durbar and to the chiefs to submit themselves to the authority of the British Government, and by a return to good faith, and the observance of prudent counsels, enable the Governor-General to organize a Sikh government in the person of a descendant of its founder, the late Maharaja Runjeet Singh, the faithful ally of the British power.

The Governor-General, at this moment of a most complete and decisive victory, cannot give a stronger proof of the forbearance and moderation of the British Government than by making this declaration of his intentions, the terms and mode of the arrangement remaining for further adjustment.

The Governor-General, therefore, calls upon all those chiefs who are well-wishers of the descendants of Runjeet Singh, and especially such chiefs as have not participated in the hostile proceedings against the British power, to act in concert with him for carrying into effect such arrangements as shall maintain a Sikh government at Lahore, capable of controlling its army and protecting its subjects, and based upon principles that shall provide for the future tranquillity of the Sikh states, shall secure the British frontier against a repetition of acts of aggression, and shall prove to the whole world the moderation and justice of the paramount power of India.

If this opportunity of rescuing the Sikh nation from military anarchy and misrule be neglected, and hostile opposition to the British army be renewed, the Government of India will make such other arrangements for the future government of the Punjab as the interests and security of the British power may render just and expedient.

By order, &c.

Proclamation by the Governor-General of India.

Camp, Lulleana, Feb. 18.

The chiefs, merchants, traders, ryots, and other inhabitants of Lahore and Amritsur, are hereby informed that his Highness Maharaja Dhuleep Singh has this day waited upon the Right Hon. the Governor-General, and expressed the contrition of himself and the Sikh government for their late hostile proceedings. The Maharaja and durbar having acquiesced in all the terms imposed by the British Government, the Governor-General having every hope that the relations of friendship will speedily be established between the two governments, the inhabitants of Lahore and Amritsur have nothing to fear from the British army.

The Governor-General and the British troops, if the conditions above adverted to are fulfilled, and no further hostile opposition is offered by the Khalsa army, will aid their endeavours for the re-establishment of the government of the descendants of Maharaja Runjeet Singh, and for the protection of its subjects.

The inhabitants of the cities in the Punjab will, in that case, be perfectly safe in person and property from any molestation by the British troops; and they are hereby called upon to dismiss apprehension, and to follow their respective callings with all confidence.

the late Maharaja Runjeet Singh until the present time are well known to the British Government.

“The satisfactory settlement of affairs, the discharge of the disturbers of public peace, and the reorganization of the army under the stipulations of the new treaty, are now engaging consideration. But lest, after the departure of the British forces, the evil-disposed should create fresh disturbances, and endeavour to ruin the state, it is the earnest and sincere desire and hope of the Lahore durbar that British troops with intelligent officers should, for some months, as circumstances may seem to require, be left at Lahore for the protection of the government and the Maharaja and the inhabitants of the city. When affairs have been satisfactorily settled, and the period prescribed for the stay of the British force shall have expired, the troops may then be withdrawn.”

Treaty between the British Government and the State of Lahore.

Whereas the treaty of amity and concord, which was concluded between the British Government and the late Maharaja Runjeet Singh, the ruler of Lahore, in 1809, was broken by the unprovoked aggression on the British provinces of the Sikh army, in December last, and whereas, on that occasion, by the proclamation dated 13th of December, the territories then in the occupation of the Maharaja of Lahore on that, the left or British, bank of the river Sutluj, were confiscated and annexed to the British provinces, and since that time hostile operations have been prosecuted by the two governments, the one against the other, which have resulted in the occupation of Lahore by the British troops; and whereas it has been determined that, upon certain conditions, peace shall be re-established between the two governments, the following treaty of peace between the Hon. English East-India Company and Maharaja Dhuleep Singh Bahadoor and his children, heirs, and successors, has been concluded on the part of the Hon. Company by Frederick Currie, Esq., and Brevet-Major Henry Montgomery Lawrence, by virtue of full powers to that effect, vested in them by the Right Hon. Sir Henry Hardinge, G.C.B., one of her Britannic Majesty's Most Hon. Privy Council, Governor-General, appointed by the Hon. Company to direct and control all their affairs in the East Indies, and on the part of his Highness the Maharaja Dhuleep Singh by Bhae Ram Singh, Raja Lal Singh, Sirdar Tej Singh, Sirdar Chuttur Singh Atareewala, Sirdar Runjoor Singh Majethia, Dewan Deena Nath, and Fakeer Noor-ud-Deen, vested with full powers and authority on the part of his highness.

Article 1. There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between the British Government on the one part, and Maharaja Dhuleep Singh, his heirs and successors, on the other.

Art. 2. The Maharaja of Lahore renounces for himself, his heirs and successors, all claim to, or connection with, the territories lying to the south of the river Sutluj, and engages never to have any concern with those territories or the inhabitants thereof.

Art. 3. The Maharaja cedes to the Hon. Company, in perpetual sovereignty, all his forts, territories, and rights, in the doab or country, hill and plain, situate between the rivers Beas and Sutluj.

Art. 4. The British Government having demanded from the Lahore state, as indemnification for the expenses of the war, in addition to the cession of territory described in Article 3, payment of one and a half crores of rupees, and the Lahore government being unable to pay the whole of this sum at this time, or to give security satisfactory to the British Government for its eventual payment, the Maharaja cedes to the Hon. Company, in perpetual sovereignty, as equivalent for one crore of rupees, all his forts, territories, rights, and interests, in the hill countries which are situate between the rivers Beas and Indus, including the provinces of Cashmere and Hazara.

Art. 5. The Maharaja will pay to the British Government the sum of fifty lacs of rupees on or before the ratification of this treaty.

Art. 6. The Maharaja engages to disband the mutinous troops of the Lahore army, taking from them their arms; and his highness agrees to reorganize the regular, or Ayeen regiments of infantry, upon the system and according to the regulations as to pay and allowances observed in the time of the late Maharaja Runjeet Singh. The Maharaja further engages to pay up all arrears to the soldiers that are discharged under the provisions of this article.

Art. 7. The regular army of the Lahore state shall henceforth be limited to 25 battalions of infantry, consisting of 800 bayonets each, with 12,000 cavalry: this number at no time to be exceeded without the concurrence of the British Government. Should it be necessary at any time, for any special cause, that this force should be increased, the cause shall be fully explained to the British Government, and when the special necessity shall have passed, the regular troops shall be again reduced to the standard specified in the former clause of this article.

Art. 8. The Maharaja will surrender to the British Government all the guns, thirty-six in number, which have been pointed against the British troops, and which, having been placed on the right bank of the river Sutluj, were not captured at the battle of Sobraon.

Art. 9. The control of the rivers Beas and Sutluj, with the continuation of the latter river, commonly called the Ghara and the Punjnud, to the confluence of the Indus at Mittunkote, and the control of the Indus from Mittunkote to the borders of Baloochistan, shall, in respect to tolls and ferries, rest with the British Government. The provisions of this article shall not interfere with the passage of boats belonging to the Lahore government on the said rivers for the purposes of traffic or the conveyance of passengers up and down their course. Regarding the ferries between the two countries respectively, at the several ghats of the said rivers, it is agreed that the British Government, after defraying all the expenses of management and establishments, shall account to the Lahore government for one-half of the net profits of the ferry collections. The provisions of this article have no reference to the ferries on that part of the river Sutluj which forms the boundary of Bahawulpore and Lahore respectively.

Art. 10. If the British Government should, at any time, desire to pass troops through the territories of his Highness the Maharaja for the protection of the British territories, or those of their allies, the British troops shall, on such special occasion, due notice being given, be allowed to pass through the Lahore territories. In such case the officers of the Lahore state will afford facilities in providing supplies and boats for the passage of the rivers, and the British Government will pay the full price of all such provisions and boats, and will make fair compensation for all private property that may be endamaged. The British Government will moreover observe all due consideration to the religious feelings of the inhabitants of those tracts through which the army may pass.

Art. 11. The Maharaja engages never to take or retain in his service any British subject, nor the subject of any European or American state, without the consent of the British Government.

Art. 12. In consideration of the services rendered by Raja Golab Singh, of Jummoo, to the Lahore state, towards procuring the restoration of the relations of amity between the Lahore and British governments, the Maharaja hereby agrees to recognize the independent sovereignty of Raja Golab Singh in such territories and districts in the hills as may be made over to the said Raja Golab Singh by separate agreement between himself and the British Government, with the dependencies thereof, which may have been in the raja's possession since the time of the late Maharaja Khuruk Singh, and the British Government, in consideration of the good conduct of Raja Golab Singh, also agrees to recognize his independence in such territories, and to admit him to the privileges of a separate treaty with the British Government.

Art. 13. In the event of any dispute or difference arising between the Lahore state and Raja Golab Singh, the same shall be referred to the arbitration of the British Government, and by its decision the Maharaja engages to abide.

Art. 14. The limits of the Lahore territories shall not be, at any time, changed without the concurrence of the British Government.

Art. 15. The British Government will not exercise any interference in the internal administration of the Lahore state, but in all cases or questions which may be referred to the British Government, the Governor-General will give the aid of his advice and good offices for the furtherance of the interests of the Lahore government.

Art. 16. The subjects of either state shall, on visiting the territories of the other, be on the footing of the subjects of the most favoured nation.

This treaty, consisting of sixteen articles, has been this day settled by Frederick Currie, Esq., and Brevet-Major Henry Montgomery Lawrence, acting under the directions of the Right Hon. Sir Henry Hardinge, G.C.B., Governor-General, on the part of the British Government, and by Bhae Ram Singh, Raja Lal Singh, Sirdar Tej Singh, Sirdar Chuttur Singh Atareewala, Runjoor Singh Majethia, Dewan Deena Nath, and Fakeer Noor-ud-Deen, on the part of the Maharaja Dhuleep Singh, and the said treaty has been this day ratified by the seal of the Right Hon. Articles of Agreement concluded between the British Government and the Lahore Durbar, on the 11th of March, 1846.

Whereas the Lahore government has solicited the Governor-General to leave a British force at Lahore, for the protection of the Maharaja's person and of the capital, till the reorganization of the Lahore army, according to the provisions of article 6 of the treaty of Lahore, dated the 9th inst. ; and whereas the Governor-General has, on certain conditions, consented to this measure ; and whereas it is expedient that certain matters concerning the territories ceded by articles 3 and 4 of the aforesaid treaty should be specifically determined, the following eight articles of agreement have this day been concluded between the aforementioned contracting parties :—

Art. 1. The British Government shall leave at Lahore, till the close of the current year, A.D. 1846, such force as shall seem to the Governor-General adequate for the purpose of protecting the person of the Maharaja and the inhabitants of the city of Lahore, during the reorganization of the Sikh army, in accordance with the provisions of article 6 of the treaty of Lahore. That force to be withdrawn at any convenient time before the expiration of the year, if the object to be fulfilled shall, in the opinion of the durbar, have been attained ; but the force shall not be detained at Lahore beyond the expiration of the current year.

Art. 2. The Lahore government agrees that the force left at Lahore, for the purpose specified in the foregoing article, shall be placed in full possession of the fort and the city of Lahore, and that the Lahore troops shall be removed from within the city. The Lahore government engages to furnish convenient quarters for the officers and men of the said force, and to pay to the British Government all the extra-expenses, in regard to the said force, which may be incurred by the British Government, in consequence of their troops being employed away from their own cantonments, and in a foreign territory.

Art. 3. The Lahore government engages to apply itself immediately and earnestly to the reorganization of its army, according to the prescribed condition, and to communicate fully with the British authorities left at Lahore as to the progress of such reorganization, and as to the location of the troops.

Art. 4. If the Lahore government fails in the performance of the conditions of the foregoing article, the British Government shall be at liberty to withdraw the force from Lahore at any time before the expiration of the period specified in article 1.

Art. 5. The British Government agrees to respect the bonâ fide rights of those jaghirdars within the territories ceded by articles 3 and 4 of the treaty of Lahore, dated 9th instant, who were attached to the families of the late Maharaja Runjeet Singh, Khurruk

Singh, and Sher Singh, and the British Government will maintain those jaghirdars in their bond fide possessions during their lives.

Art. 6. The Lahore government shall receive the assistance of the British local authorities in recovering the arrears of revenue justly due to the Lahore government from their kardars and managers in the territories ceded by the provisions of articles 3 and 4 of the treaty of Lahore, to the close of the Khurreef harvest of the current year, viz. 902 of the Sumbut Bikramajeet.

Art. 7. The Lahore government shall be at liberty to remove from the forts in the territories specified in the foregoing article all treasure and state property, with the exception of guns. Should, however, the British Government desire to retain any part of the said property, they shall be at liberty to do so, paying for the same at a fair valuation, and the British officers shall give their assistance to the Lahore government in disposing on the spot of such part of the aforesaid property as the Lahore government may not wish to remove, and the British officers may not desire to retain.

Art. 8. Commissioners shall be immediately appointed by the two governments to settle and lay down the boundary between the two states, as defined by article 4 of the treaty of Lahore, dated March 9, 1846.

No. VIII.

Treaty between the British Government and Maharaja Golab Singh, concluded at Amritsur on the 16th of March, 1846.

Treaty between the British Government on the one part, and Maharaja Golab Singh, of Jummoo, on the other, concluded on the part of the British Government by Frederick Currie, Esq., and Brevet-Major Henry Montgomery Lawrence, acting under the orders of the Right Hon. Sir Henry Hardinge, G.C.B., one of her Britannic Majesty's Most Hon. Privy Council, Governor-General, appointed by the Hon. Company to direct and control all their affairs in the East Indies, and by Maharaja Golab Singh in person.

Art. 1. The British Government transfers and makes over, for ever, in independent possession, to Maharaja Golab Singh, and the heirs male of his body, all the hilly or mountainous country, with its dependencies, situate to the eastward of the river Indus, and westward of the river Ravi, including Chumba and excluding Lahoul, being part of the territory ceded to the British Government by the Lahore state, according to the provisions of article 4 of the treaty of Lahore, dated 9th March, 1846.

Art. 2. The eastern boundary of the tract transferred by the foregoing article to Maharaja Golab Singh shall be laid down by commissioners appointed by the British Government and Maharaja Golab Singh respectively for that purpose, and shall be defined in a separate engagement after survey.

Art 3. In consideration of the transfer made to him and his heirs, by the provisions of the foregoing articles, Maharaja Golab Singh will pay to the British Government the sum of 75 lacs of rupees (Nanukshahi), 50 lacs to be paid on ratification of this treaty, and

Art. 4. The limits of the territories of Maharaja Golab Singh shall not be at any time changed without the concurrence of the British Government.

Art. 5. Maharaja Golab Singh will refer to the arbitration of the British Government any disputes or questions that may arise between himself and the government of Lahore, or any other neighbouring state, and will abide by the decision of the British Government.

Art. 6. Maharaja Golab Singh engages for himself and heirs to join with the whole of his military force the British troops when employed within the hills, or in the territories adjoining his possessions.

Art. 7. Maharaja Golab Singh engages never to take or retain in his service any British subject, nor the subject of any European or American state, without the consent of the British Government.

Art. 8. Maharaja Golab Singh engages to respect, in regard to the territory transferred to him, the provisions of articles 5, 6, and 7 of the separate engagement between the British Government and the Lahore durbar, dated March 11, 1846.

Art. 9. The British Government will give its aid to Maharaja Golab Singh in protecting his territories from external enemies.

Art. 10. Maharaja Golab Singh acknowledges the supremacy of the British Government, and will, in token of such supremacy, present annually to the British Government one horse, twelve perfect shawl-goats of approved breed (six male and six female), and three pairs of Cashmere shawls.

This treaty, consisting of ten articles, has been this day settled by Frederick Currie, Esq., and Brevet-Major Henry Montgomery Lawrence, acting under the directions of the Right Hon. Sir Henry Hardinge, G.C.B., Governor-General, on the part of the British Government, and by Maharaja Golab Singh in person, and the said treaty has been this day ratified by the seal of the Right Hon. Sir Henry Hardinge, G.C.B., Governor-General.
